

Mexican Guayule Production Helps Solve U. S. Rubber Problem

The semi-arid plains of north central Mexico abound in wild rubber-bearing guayule shrub. Here native Indians gather the shrub that will eventually find its way into the war effort of the United Nations.

This interesting device is the scale on which the shrub is weighed at the guayule camp. Upon the weight of the shrub depends the amount of money the workers get for their efforts.

After weighing, the shrub is pressed into one hundred pound bales by means of this ancient baling machine. The General Tire and Rubber Company plans on introducing modern American methods to replace the system which has been in use since the guayule industry got its start 50 years ago.

Steep mountain paths and barely broken trails are followed by the ox carts as they wend their way from camp to the nearest pickup station where trucks collect the bales for delivery to the mill.

Here the shredded shrub is being placed in old fashioned rotating drums where one step in the separation of the rubber is accomplished. To increase the production of rubber for use in the American War program, the General Tire & Rubber Company has announced plans for a guayule project in Mexico and will erect an extraction mill in the heart of the guayule area in the state of Coahuila.

Here is pictured a pile of the 50 kilo square sheets, ready for shipment. Guayule is real rubber, not a synthetic, and the guayule shrub contains a greater percentage of rubber by dry weight than any other known plant, according to General chemists.
