Large Quantity Talc Occurs In Cherokee

By Dr. A. F. Greaves-Walker (N. C. State College)

RALEIGH - Among the minetals occurring in North Carolina in commercial quantities which are common to only a few states in the country are kyanite, talc, and pyrophyllite. These minerals have been mined in the state for many years past, and some manufactured products have been produced from tale and pyrophyllite.

Talc is a silicate of magnesium. One of its most important physical qualities is its "greasy feel" or the bridge near Tomotla, officers slip.

All the deposits of true talc are in the western part of the state. Deposits are known to occur in Cherokee, Swain, Graham, Jackson, Ashe, Buncombe, Alleghany, Madison and Yancey counties. The most important deposits that have been worked commercially are in a belt extending from near Hewitts. Swain county, in a southwestward direction into Cherokee county to the town of Kinsey.

The deposits parallel the Murphy branch of the Southern railway and occur in leng-shaped masses varying in length from a few feet to about 1,500 and in width up to about 100 feet or more.

Pure talc has a great many commercial uses but as the North Carolina mineral usually contains impurities, it is limited to paints, paper fillers, roofing coatings, tire powders, metal crayons, and welding rod coatings. A small amount of carefully selected material has been used in steatite bodies. During the war, practically the entire output was used in the manufacture of metal crayons.

North Carolina has a RII established metal crayon industry in the jewelry field. Although he there appears to be no reason why in charge of the buying. production of ground tale of good color should not take care of the demand in the Southeast for fillers, tire powders, and roofing coalings.
