Five Suggestions Listed For Cutting Food Budget

by HELEN HALL
Chairman, National Association of Consumers

Five good suggestions for cutting pennies, and even dollars from your food budget were given us by nutrition experts in the Department of Agriculture in Washington. So many women had asked us if we knew any tricks for cutting food expenses that we went right to the experts to get specific answers.

Because meat takes such a large portion of your food dollar every week, four suggestions remind us how to buy meat, how to use meat, and how to stretch meat.

First there are meat extenders: stews with crusts, pot pies, and meat-noodle combinations. This way one pound of meat makes a nourishing main dish for a family of four.

Then, remember meat alternates. Fish is a good buy generally, and there is little waste on fish because it does not "cook away." Cheese is another meat alternate, and a good buy right now. Eggs, too, are plentiful, and eight large eggs make a pound, giving you as much protein as a pound of beef.

Third, the differential in price between economy cuts and luxury cuts of meat is even wider than normally. Generally, there is no more bone or fat on economy cuts like breast, than there is on luxury chops.

You should, of course, turn all fat into an asset, and that is a fourth money-saving suggestion. Save all used cooking fat that comes out when meat is cooked, and sell it to your meat dealer. Kitchen salvage not only adds pennies to your budget, but subtracts dollars from your plumber's bills for opening clogged drains.

Finally, there is a great budget advantage in using standard rather than fancy grades of canned goods. Standard grade peas, for instance, cost about one-fourth as much as fancy peas, and are just as nutritious, appetizing and palatable.

Five tricks for cutting food budgets:

- 1—Use meat extenders
- 2—Buy meat alternates
- 3—Use economy cuts of meat
- 4—Salvage used cooking fat
- 5—Purchase standard grades of canned goods

Although the future is uncertain and prices for farm products may decline within the next few years, the progressive and efficient farmer can begin now to prepare himself for bad times as well as good, believes Charles E. Clark, Extension farm management specialist at State College.

Mr. Clark said farmers must systematically plan adjustments to meet any unfavorable conditions which may arise. In such planning, he added, they should keep a watchful eye on these factors: Maintenance of high yields per acre for all crops; best combination of enterprises for highest returns; shifts from animal power to tractor power; adoption of latest recommended cultural practices; and use of cover crops and other conservation practices for best land use.

The key word for successful farming in the future is efficiency, the specialist asserted. Additional fertilizer, use of soil-conserving legumes in rotation, use of labor-saving machinery, better seed varieties, and better pest and insect control measures will cost more, but the additional expenditures may be more than justified in increased yields per acre.

Adoption of latest recommended practices in all enterprises will lead to greater efficiency, Mr. Clark said. The proper combination of all enterprises according to the suitability of the land will pay dividends over the years. The livestock system must be balanced with cash crops, and feed production geared to the needs of the farm.

Addition of machinery best fitted to the needs of the particular farm to replace the "hay-burners" will add to efficiency, the Extension specialist added. The feed released in the replaced workstock will mean possibility of an increase in productive livestock.
