YESTERDAY WAS LONGEST DAY

America's season in the sun arrived this year in the dark night. Summertime officially started on June 21 at 11:32 p. m., eastern standard time.

Dawn of June 22 brought the northern hemisphere's longest day of 1955. The National Geographic Society noted, however, that the sun's work varies at different latitudes.

Weather permitting, it shined for more than 15 1/4 hours at Minneapolis, a few minutes less than 15 hours at Washington, D. C., and some five minutes more than 14 hours at New Orleans.

Paradoxically, neither the year's earliest sunrise nor latest sunset occurs on the longest day. The sun made its earliest appearance in mid-June and disappears latest near the end of the month.

SUN STANDS STILL Summer bowed in when the sun reached the limit of its apparent northward journey. Then it shines directly overhead at the Tropic of Cancer, an imaginary line that encircles the earth 23 1/2 degrees or about 1,600 miles north of the Equator.

For several days the sun's noon position seems fixed. The period is thus known as the summer solstice, a derivation from the Latin phrase "when the sun stands still."

Actually the sun begins its small migration southward at once. Six months later it shines directly above the Tropic of Capricorn, starting summer in the southern hemisphere.

As the sun seemingly withdraws—a phenomenon caused by the earth's own canting—the summer days get hotter and hotter. This is because the sun warms the cold earth during its northward swing, storing so much heat that less sunshine sustains uncomfortably high temperature readings.

DOG DAYS

The ancient Greeks had a word for this oppressive period of four to six weeks. They referred to the time of sticky, close heat waves as "dog days," because they usually coincided with the rise of the dog star Sirius. The star rises at a different time now, but the name stuck.

During the dog days, Sol rules the land. Air-conditioning units work overtime. Cars point to beaches and mountain resorts. Crops ripen in gold and green fields. Newspapers carry the monotonous prediction, "Fair and warmer."

As sufferers long have suspected, the United States does get hotter than the tropics at times. Every state in the Union has recorded temperature of more than 100 degrees. The hottest spot is Furnace Creek in California's Death Valley. An all-time high of 134 degrees was recorded there in 1913.

But sizzling Aziza, a village in northwest Libya, holds the world's official record. On a memorable, breathless day in September, 1922, the mercury bubbled up to the 136.4-degree mark.
