A session of Congress is, in some respects, like a baseball game. One team is made up of Democrats and the other of Republicans. Each is trying to make a "hit" with voters or "score" by passing a bill that would be popular with the "fans."

And, of course, each wants to throw the other "out." You are the umpire, and sometimes the coach as well. Every two years, in November, you add up the box score and cast your vote for the team you think has done the best job.

If your principal interest is farming, you look at the box score on farm legislation. We thought it might be interesting to take an impartial look at what the second session of the 84th Congress did about one of the most controversial issues it faced, that of farm legislation.

President Eisenhower opened the session in January by throwing out a 9-point farm program which he asked Congress to pass. You might say it was a 9-inning game starting in January and ending in July.

With Secretary Ezra Taft Benson pitching and the Democrats at bat, the first ball hit was a line drive 90%-of-parity bill directly to Eisenhower. It was a hot one, but he scooped it up and threw the Democrats out at first, with a veto.

Then the Republicans came to bat and the first pitch was the soil bank. The Democrats looked it over and let it go by for a strike, although some of them claimed it was a foul. At any rate it can put an extra $1.2 billion a year in farmers' pockets, and no Democrat thought that was bad.

Next, the President called for surplus disposal program, bigger and better than ever before. Democrats and Republicans both went to bat on that one, and the result was a $5 billion "home run" appropriation that landed in the White House front yard and was autographed by Eisenhower.

The game was delayed while Democrats and Republicans argued some more about price supports. Secretary Benson, the Democrats contended, had been pitching them too low. President Eisenhower said he thought so, too, and ordered Benson to raise them some.

Eisenhower called for strengthening of commodity programs. Democratic leaders on the Hill put through an extension of the Sugar and Wheat Agreement Acts, but they also "froze" cotton and rice acreage allotments and tossed out modernized parity.

The next play you might call a "balk." Eisenhower asked for a limit on the size of price support loans any one grower could get, but Benson never would say how much, and so Congress did nothing. Eisenhower also called for an expanded rural development program, but Congress didn't even swing at it.

An always popular pitch with Congress was a request for more research funds. Congress dished up an extra $17 million and then created a Commission to find ways to spend an added $100 million searching for industrial uses for farm surpluses.

A call for better and easier farm credit was right down Congress' alley and the lawmakers batted out laws to consolidate the Production Credit Corporations with the Federal Intermediate Credit Banks and authorize the Farmers Home Administration to be more liberal with its money. It added $150 million to help Great Plains farmers shift from crops to grass in the Dust Bowl.

Ninth point in the Eisenhower program was repeal of the Federal tax on farm-used gasoline, and both Democrats and Republicans scored that as a hit. Who won? That will be decided on November
