TOTS and TEENS
By Mrs. Joan Cameron

Our first-born announced his initial case of diaper rash with a special wail that we had not heard before. It wasn't a hunger cry, all pins were intact, he wasn't feverish, and he was too young to be teething. So, I changed his diaper and discovered raw red patches of skin below his tummy.

Being our number one son, he bore the brunt of our inexperience. But I soon found out from the pediatrician that diaper rash can be prevented, and neither he nor our subsequent offspring have suffered from this all too common irritation since that time.

The secret in preventing diaper rash is to limit the opportunity of bacteria to turn urine into ammonia; ammonia is what causes the rash.

You are not likely to run into trouble if you change your baby's diaper whenever necessary, coat his skin in the diaper area with a pure ointment such as Vaseline petroleum jelly, and make sure that the diapers are washed thoroughly so as to remove all traces of ammonia. Other tips we have found helpful are rinsing the diapers right after they are removed, using absorbent wool soakers instead of water-proof pants, and making sure that diapers are thoroughly rinsed after washing to remove all soap residues.

If your tot is already afflicted, go heavy on the petroleum jelly, which is relatively inexpensive compared to other lotions and ointments, and make sure that the skin in the diaper area is exposed to the air frequently each day.
