ALUMINUM LEADS THE WAY

If you understand a basic law of physics, that the heavier an object is the more energy it takes to move it, then it's probably easy to understand why an aluminum alloy engine is an advantage in the family car.

Like a lean long distance runner, aluminum alloy engines can be much lighter than cast iron ones. This, in turn, allows a lighter front end, and so on through the whole car.

Aluminum engines also heat up and cool more quickly, thereby delivering better efficiency. And when you combine aluminum alloy with an engine design that's flat rather than tall, the result is low weight and a low center of gravity. This results in better handling. That's why the engineers at Subaru, the nation's only American operated, publicly owned import automobile company, chose a special aluminum alloy, horizontally opposed 4-cylinder engine for their front and 4-wheel drive cars.

Exactly how much weight... and gas... is saved by using an aluminum alloy engine? It's hard to say exactly, but consider that Subaru 4-wheel drive cars have the highest EPA gas mileage ratings of any 4-wheel drive cars sold in America.

Purchasing the best, most fuel efficient car for the money in these times of high gas prices is more important than ever. Buying American operated, publicly owned import automobile horizontally opposed engine just might be your best choice.
