

...In the Park Service

Miss Meredith Gall Dial has resumed her activities with the park service after being sent to Moores Creek for the summer. Presently she is doing seasonal work, but hopes to be accepted for full time employment. She says that working for the park service is a very rewarding position and she likes it very much.

Meredith is presently working as a 4-G rating but is soon to be moving to 5 G rating. She is the daughter of Hughes and Georgianna Dial. She states that she has had an opportunity to make new and lasting friends in the park service and hopes to travel to many different places.

School Animal Poster Winners

ASHEBORO--What would you name an ostrich, a bird which cannot fly but runs up to 40 miles per hour? One North Carolina third-grader suggested "Adidas."

Robeson County schoolchildren and others statewide submitted imaginative names for eight poster animals in the "We Love You Zoo" Contest, sponsored by the North Carolina Zoological Park and in-state Pizza Hut restaurants to teach children about wildlife.

Now 667 school level winners including students from Robeson County, are competing at the regional level for $500, $300 and $100 scholarship awards. In mid-summer, two statewide winners will each receive a $2,000 scholarship award, presented by Governor Jim Hunt, who will also present a $2,000 education grant to the children's schools.

School winners in Robeson County in the Kindergarten-4 contest and their schools are: Meredith Cochman, St. Pauls Elementary; Jody Emanuel, West Lumberton Elementary; Landry McDuffie, Lumberton Middle; Chris Rogers, Tanglewood Elementary; Nkonya Godwin, Pembroke Elementary.

In the contest for grades 5-8, winners and their schools are: Pamela Shepard, St. Pauls Elementary and Dan Hunt, Lumberton Junior High School.

All winners at the school level will receive one year memberships in the North Carolina Zoological Society.

Public and private schools across the state received contest kits in early May containing posters of a giraffe, African Crowned Crane, Lilac breasted Roller, rhinoceros, ostrich, lion, a chimpanzee and a group of elephants. Information on the back of each poster told students what each animal ate, its size, what sort of "family life" it had and singular aspects of its body and behavior.

In competition, children in grades kindergarten-4 were asked to give personal names to all the poster animals except the roller. Students in grades 5-8 named the roller and answered the questions about the other seven animals, based on the information provided.

Some of the younger children created very apt names. One called the crowned crane, a "tall bird with cheeks and a blond topknot, "Princess Di." Perhaps a politician-to-be pegged the elephant "Tusk Force." The king of beasts was, of course the "Mane One."

School administrators picked one winning entry each from students in grades kindergarten-4 and 5-8 for submission to regional and state competitions.

WHO'S NEWS

Washington notables and art lovers gathered in the Department of Labor's Great Hall to salute the American worker and view the unveiling of a series of 22 dry oil paintings entitled "America at Work" by noted black artist Paul Collins.

Commissioned by the Amway Corporation, the paintings show Americans in various work situations, ranging from Mstislav Rostropovich playing his cello, to a young Vietnamese immigrant delivering newspapers. Amway's president, Richard DeVos noted, "This is a salute to the American worker. It is a salute to all those millions of people whose work has combined to make this country what it is today. It is a salute—equally—to the famous and not so famous."

Following the Washington exhibition, the paintings will be on permanent display at the new $65 million Amway Grand Plaza Hotel in Grand Rapids, Michigan, which will be dedicated this coming Labor Day.

Collins, best known for his giant mural of the life of former President Gerald R. Ford, has created an impressive portfolio, including portraits of American Indians and West Africans.

"The idea for the series came from my travels around the world, comparing our workers with those in other countries," said Mr. Collins.

"When Paul came to us with the idea, we immediately sparked to it," said Jay Van Andel, Amway chairman. "Our company was founded to provide goods and services to help others live better. This series shows Americans doing their jobs with pride and dedication. To me, that is what America is all about."

Many of the subjects of Collins' paintings were on hand at the opening, including Paul Homrich, an 81-year-old Michigan farmer who had never before traveled outside his home state.

Amway Corporation has been committed to supporting the arts. The co-founders of the worldwide direct selling company contend that cultural activities deserve greater financial support from the private sector. In 1982, Amway sponsored the National Symphony Orchestra's European tour of 17 cities.

Bingo Buffs

Flock To Game

CHEROKEE — Thousands of players, paying $500 each, flocked Saturday to this remote Indian reservation town near the Great Smoky Mountains to play for $1 million in what was billed as the world's biggest bingo session.

John Tate, a spokesman for Cherokee Bingo Management Inc., said 2,500 had paid the admission price in advance and another 500 were expected to show up at the door in this isolated hill community 60 miles southeast of Knoxville, Tenn.

Prizes since play began last Dec. 4 have averaged $250,000 a week. But Saturday the reservation was hosting a $1 million session that included a final game with a $200,000 prize. The top prize in the final game was to go to the first player to cover an entire card. If there was no winner after 48 calls, the prize was to be cut in half.

Other jackpot games were to have prizes of $50,000, $100,000 and $150,000 with 30 opening contests awarding $5,000 and another 20 offering $20,000.

The games, which have lifted the impoverished Eastern Band of Cherokees from an economy based on the sale of rubber tomahawks and other items to tourists, have created some controversy.

The tribe, which traditionally raised money by dressing "chiefs" to pose with tourists, expects to clear as much as $750,000 during the first year of bingo, increasing its annual budget by one third.

"I'm quite concerned about it," said U.S. Attorney Charles Brewer in Asheville. "The money coming in is very significant and it is going to bring in the wrong element. We have some indication that it is already here."

"Our feeling is that many of these responses are knee-jerk reflex responses," said tribal counsel Ben Bridgers. "The problem of the Indians here and in other places is that the public response, or the one that gets printed in the media, are the 'grave concerns.'"

The 9,000-member band last August authorized a company headed by tribe members Dan McCoy and John Young to hold the games in a tribe-owned factory building.

McCoy and Young, in turn, contracted with Cherokee Bingo Management Inc. to promote and run the games.

"We wanted something that was different from anywhere else, and that's why the big money," explained President Sherman Lighty of Newport News, Va. "Because after all, Cherokee is a remote place and you've got to have something to bring them in."

The tribe gets $150,000 a year from the deal, plus $2 per player, 1 percent of gross receipts and 6 percent of concession sales.

That is much-needed money to a reservation accustomed to the peaks and valleys of an economy 70 percent dependent on tourism.

"It's been a big asset to the area," said tribal revenue officer Richard Bird. "You got to figure it not only brings in revenue but it also helps bring in tourists and that filters down to the motels and restaurants."

McCoy, 39, who also is a tribal council member and candidate for chief, said he was not surprised by questions of organized crime or improper dealings. He said he believes the FBI is monitoring him and his operation.

"I'm proud of my Indian heritage," he said. "I have enough respect for my people not to do something like that. We're all clean people here."

"But that's the way it goes. Indians get something, good going and somebody wants to take it away from them."

TENNIS TRIVIA

Competition for the Davis Cup was limited to the U. S., England, Australia and New Zealand until 1927 when players from throughout the world were permitted to enter.

Great Britain's Michael Sangster holds the record for the fastest serve ever recorded. He was clocked at 154 mph in 1963.

According to Figgie International's Fred Perry division, England's Major Walter Clopton is said to be the "father of modern tennis."

WINNER OF CERTIFICATE

Johnny P. Chavis of Pembroke was the winner of a gift certificate for $30 awarded by Conner Mobile Homes of Lumberton during the Lumbee Homecoming celebration over the weekend.

WATER FACTS AND FANCIES

Here are a few facts about water that you might like to add to your flow of conversation.

For instance, few Americans may realize it, but we're the world's greatest consumers of fresh water. If you include industrial use, the average consumption of water in the U.S. is some 1,855 gallons per person per day.

Americans use more water per capita than any other people—and it's our least expensive commodity.
