THE HARDYS: MISSIONARIES IN AFRICA

by I. Ruth Martin

Lawrence and Alice Hardy are serving in Monrovia, Liberia, as missionaries for the Southern Baptist Convention. Missionaries are witnesses for Jesus who are following a personal call to "make all nations disciples." To do this, such dedicated people accept literally Jesus' instructions to "Be my witnesses."

To most missionaries on the foreign field this means to serve night and day; at home, at work, and at play; and then on Sunday to do just a little bit more than you do during the week.

The Hardys have been called by God to serve in Liberia, a third world country West Africa, only four degrees above the equator. Of the two million population, over 95 percent of the people are members of 16 different tribes. The country has 9 counties and 6 territories. At present the ruling head is President Samuel K. Doe.

For the Hardys, service by night can mean committee meetings for Lawrence as many as three nights in the week. It can mean entertaining students, Liberian friends, and/or missionaries in their home after working hours. Alice makes delicious chocolate cream in a small electric freezer for most of this entertainment. Such night service also means getting up at 3 a.m. to take a woman to the local hospital for emergency treatment because there is no transportation available at that hour.

Day time service sees Lawrence in his study each morning at 4:30 or 5 to study and outline lectures for his classes in Sociology, or Theology, or Religious Education. During these early hours the coolness of the dawn will find Alice sitting at the dining room table for her morning devotional. Breakfast, and Lawrence is off to the classroom.

Editor's Note: Miss I. Ruth Martin is an associate professor of religion at Pembroke State University. She recently returned from a 6 week trip to Liberia. While there she renewed a long standing friendship with Rev. and Mrs.

Lawrence Hardy, the former pastor of Berea Baptist Church in Pembroke. We are grateful to her for sharing this story with our readers, especially the many friends of the Hardys.
