In- his recent column Forest Kinnett, editor of one of the local newspapers, made some interesting comments concerning the ease of farming. I found these comments amusing, as I am sure he intended them to be. Unfortunately, this is a common feeling of those who have never been involved with farming and have never experienced the many unexpected and uncontrollable There are lew professions that require as much investment as does farming. This investment includes not only

I have often heard the comparison of a farmer to a gambler. The farmer makes his bets with his investment of money, time, and capital and then gambles that the rains will come, that it will not get too hot, that the seed he planted will come up, that he will not have any unexpected disease problems, doesn't know what his winnings will be because he has not control over market prices. There is a lot of stress brought about by the uncertainty of the possibilities mentioned above. As Forest was concerned about his three rows of garden, imagine the stress that would develop if there was the same concern about hundreds of acres of crops when each acre involved at least several hundred dollars of initial investment and the livelihood of you and your family would depend upon this outcome.

There has been a lot of concern lately about the sive to produce a crop under stress conditions than under normal conditions because the ground is so hard. additional herbicides are required because herbicides are not as effective under dry conditions, additional cultivations are needed because the herbicides do not react properly, and additional time is needed because the farm laborers cannot work as effectively when it is extremely hot.

So, as Forest said, "There is more to this farming thing than just watching the tractor do all the work." If you have any doubts, or if you would like to see firsthand what is involved in this
