Label Offers Key To Consumers' Questions

Consumers are worried about food additives, according to recent research. "Additives preserve the quality, nutritional value, flavor and appearance of foods that are shipped and stored," says Rachel Kinlaw, extension food specialist at North Carolina State University. She breaks the types of additives down into basic categories:

- Antioxidants prevent food spoilage or the undesirable change in color or flavor caused by oxygen. They also help keep oils and fats from turning rancid. BHA, BHT, propyl gallate are some of the common antioxidants.
- Emulsifiers help keep oil and water from separating. They are used in foods such as salad dressings. Emulsifiers also prevent the ingredients foods with fat, like chocolate, from separating. They also improve the texture in baked goods. Lecithin, which comes from soybeans, acts as an emulsifier in foods like chocolate and margarine.

- Nutrients may be added to improve the nutritional quality or to increase the amounts of nutrients which are normally difficult to get in the diet. Iron and calcium are two examples.
- Leavening agents cause baking products to rise.
- Stabilizers and thickeners give foods a smooth texture, thicken beverages, jams, jellies, ice cream and prevent water from freezing into large crystals. Examples include starches, carrageenan, locust bean gum, alginate, gelatin and pectin.

Veteran's Post

NEW VA REHABILITATION CENTER: The Department of Veterans Affairs is establishing a new rehabilitation center in Cleveland to conduct research to help victims of spinal cord injury and other disabling conditions to acquire some limited use of their limbs. The VA Center of Excellence in Functional Electrical Stimulation (FES) is a collaborative effort with researchers and health care professionals from the Cleveland VA Medical Center, Case Western Reserve University, and MetroHealth Medical Center.

FES is electrical activation of nerves to stimulate movement of paralyzed muscles. It's one of the therapies used to treat many of the 10,000 or so people disabled by spinal cord injury every year, or who lose the ability to walk or use their hands due to stroke, head injury and other physical problems. For more information on the FES treatment at the Cleveland area rehabilitation center, see your local VA medical center.

SPECIAL MENTION: To American League umpire Larry Barnett for his visits to VA hospitals around the country, and to the Disabled American Veterans (DAV) for sponsoring these visits.

Pet Care

by Cleo & Brad Conrad

Q. Our eight-year-old dog has been diagnosed by the vet as having heart problems. The vet has suggested a complete cardiac work-up. He says he can then treat the dog once he knows exactly what he's dealing with. We're not sure if it's worth it to put the poor dog through all this. What do you know about this?

A. It is worth it. Cardiac problems in dogs can be controlled, and the prognosis is usually excellent when the problem is detected early. Treatment can include medication, diet and moderate exercise.

Q. A friend of mine recently got a cat. She called me the other day to ask me which groomer I use for my cat. I was surprised. I've never taken my cat to be groomed. In fact, I've never even bathed her. Have I been neglecting her?

A. Personally, we think only show cats should be groomed. As for bathing at home, that's recommended only if your cat has gotten into some dirty mischief. Cats are naturally clean animals and take care of their own grooming. If your friend wants to have her cat groomed, by all means, she should. However, if the cat is simply a house pet, it's totally unnecessary.
