Local Abuse Program to be Administered by North Carolina Indian Commission

The North Carolina Commission of Indian Affairs is administering a program in three counties for the prevention of child abuse and neglect. The program was one of two projects funded in the United States. It is funded by the Department of Health and Human Services.

The Child Abuse and Neglect Prevention Demonstration Project seeks to improve interagency cooperation and coordination in providing the full range of services required for the prevention, intervention, and treatment of child abuse and neglect through a case management and parenting skills development approach. The program started in May 1993 and will operate for three years. The project is being implemented in Robeson, Halifax, and Warren counties. These counties are being targeted because of the high incidence of child abuse and neglect in these among the Native American population as reported by the North Carolina Department of Human Resources.

The project staff is comprised of a director Lana Dial, and three case managers, Christine Locklear and

Anthony Locklear of Robeson; and Michelle Richardson for Halifax and Warren Counties.

The two case workers in managers located in Robeson County are working with the Lumbee Indian Tribe. The third case manager works with the Haliwa-Saponi Indian Tribe whose land spans Halifax and Warren counties. Each case manager will maintain a case load of approximately 20 families.

Community health and human service providers are referring children and their caretakers to the project who have been identified as abusing or are at risk for abusing and neglecting Indian children. The case managers assess the needs of each family and develop and individual care plan tailored to the needs of individual children, adolescents, violence shelters, counseling services, emergency food assistance programs, domestic health care and mental health services, child care assistance, employment and education services, and parenting skills development.

The office serving Robeson is located at 108 W. 9th Street in Lumberton.

Chapter I class at Prospect School studies newspapers

Shown above are students in the Chapter I class at Prospect School and their instructor, Mrs. Barbara Burton. Recently the students were learning about newspapers. They learned how to use the index to find out what is in a newspaper; about people in the news; to locate the facts in news stories by identifying the 5 W's—who, when, where, what, and why; how to shop in the newspaper through advertisements; and the comics in the newspapers. The students all made a shopping list for Christmas and they used the newspaper advertisement to buy an item for their parents for Christmas. The students each researched and studied the recent stories relative to the Lumbee Bill.
