Get Kids "Fit" For Their Future—
Begin At Preschool Age

When should parents start getting their kids fit for the future? Today's child development experts agree that physical activity should be introduced to children in early preschool years.

"Today, when fewer than one-third of America's children are physically fit and childhood obesity is on the rise, parents of young preschoolers, ages 3 to 5, should ensure that regular activity is part of their family lifestyle," says Dr. Judith Young, executive director of the National Association for Sport and Physical Education (NASPE). Children will gravitate toward a healthier, more active lifestyle if they are exposed to stimulating, movement-oriented environments when they're toddlers, reports Dr. Young, who recently, along with KinderCare Learning Centers, the nation's largest child care company, developed the first developmentally-appropriate movement videos and classroom activities for children ages 3 to 5.

The videos, entitled Let's Move, Let's Play!, are being integrated into KinderCare's educational program for over 120,000 children nationwide, and are available to parents and early childhood educators for purchase by calling NASPE at (800) 321-0789.

According to Dr. Marcy Guddemi, vice president of education and research for KinderCare, "It's very important for parents to provide their child with a myriad of opportunities for developing an interest in physical activity." Dr. Guddemi recommends the following tips from the Let's Move, Let's Play! program to help parents motivate their children to enjoy physical activity, and build confidence in their movement potential:

* Schedule time throughout the week for family activities that encourage your child to enjoy physical fitness as part of a normal routine in his or her life. Take advantage of local resources, including parks and community centers; expose your children to a variety of activities, including dancing, walking, hiking, swimming, biking, etc.

* Create an inviting, "risk-free" area in your home where your child can enjoy safe, unrestricted movement activity. Encourage the use of music tapes and movement videos in this special movement area. (This will also help to limit your child's time watching television.)

* Bolster your child's interest in physical activity by encouraging him or her with recognition and praise for efforts and by joining in with him or her.

* Value your child's unique activity interests and abilities; avoid comparisons with other children.

* Be sure to emphasize the importance of having fun; avoid a push "to win."

* Children learn by example—if you enjoy and participate regularly in physical activity, so will your child.

Note: To order the Let's Move, Let's Play! movement video, call NASPE, 1-800-321-0789
