COMMERCIAL HUSBANDRY IS ESTABLISHED AT KINSTON (Special to Daily News.)

Kinston, Sept. 25.—The establishment of the first commercial rabbitry in this section at Ladrage may mean the beginning of a considerable industry in the territory, according to federal animal husbandry men. W. J. Brotherton is responsible for the innovation. Experiments by amateur breeders have proved that such prozyder as honeysuckle vines will cause young rabbits to grow at an astounding rate. Grasses of many kinds are fancied by the rabbit palate. They require comparatively little space and a doe with a family can be accommodated in a box no larger than a cracker box until the young are ready to leave home and set out on their own account. Several breeds range in weight to 10 or 12 pounds or even larger when grown, and the animals are marketable at 3 or 4 months of age. A single doe is capable of producing and rearing 100 bunnies in a year, exclusive of "runts" left to die. A large part of the hundred will be having families of their own in seven or eight months.
