"Some Christmas Cheer and a Good Sermon"

You Are Invited

They all were waiting for a king
To slay their foes and lift them high
Thou canst a little baby thing
That made a woman cry.

And though we have had that strange spectacle before us for nearly twenty hundred years, we have not yet seen the point of it. For when men speak—as many men have spoken in these latter days—of the "second" coming, they think of the Son of Man as a king, coming in all the pomp and display of secular royalty. But, unless God has changed his own nature, the one thing we may be quite sure of is that if the Son of Man comes he will come as he came before—in great humility; no king, but a servant; no emperor, but just a man among men.

Into a world which worships greatness he came in the weakness of a little child. In a world which is dazed by pomp and glitter he was laid in a manger. In a world which was drunken with power he chose to be a servant. In a world in which men paid respect to riches he had nowhere to lay his head, and in a world which cherished respectability he died on a criminal's gibbet.

Since ever time began men have dreamed of the perfect ruler, some happy prince who shall love his people well, whose power shall be gentle, wise and just. History is witness with the effort of men to find a hero strong with the gentleness of true greatness, and then to establish him in dominion over their broken lives and warring wills. Long ago they found him; but all who find him lose him, though all have found him fair. The same dream came true when from the little town of Bethlehem there came the Man of Good Will, the lover of the race. Each year, for a brief day, so swift to go, Lord Christ rules over us. Each year we give Him Christmas Day, permitting his will to prevail, and his brooding spirit to rest upon the nations.

Toward that gentle interlude—the Day of the Truce of God—we look forward longingly, and when it is ended we look back longingly, to the time when we were good together. His spirit breathes through the hours, like faint music in the night. Strife, anger, tumult and the hurry of the little days are forgotten. In his authority there is peace. A while we dwell in his kingdom. Touched with mortality, as in all earthly beauty, the day of Christ is gone while the welcome is still on our lips. He came and he passed, because we are troubled about many things. And, oh if his dominion over the hearts of men were more than an episode—if he might abide—it would be well with us, and pity and joy would walk the common way of man.
