Captured Americans Placed on Exhibition

Coblenz, March 11. How it feels to be exhibited in Germany will be told when Joseph Brown and Charles Knowlton, both of the 165th Infantry, get back to New York where they lived before the war.

Both have rejoined their regiment after imprisonment in Germany since May 5, when a patrol they were on went out in search of Germans who were needed for the information they might give. The patrol got the Germans hit the German army got Brown and his comrade, Knowlton, and found a few days ago the 165th infantry knew nothing more about them. Both had come through the German lines after the armistice.

After the German intelligence office had despaired of getting from Germany accurate information about the Americans both men were sent out on a tour of Germany. In city after city they were exhibited as specimens of the new enemy.

and Lewis Williams. None of those who arrived last night was wounded.

The regiment did most of its fighting in the St. Die sector. The Germans made several attacks against the colored soldiers, but in every instance were repelled. The Americans suffering losses in the Heidelsheim.

After September 4 the division went on a tour in the Argonne forest. The battle front quieted out of it, and while at this point the fighting of the Germans. Once the regiment left the battle front, and as a result, a reduction of its strength is still continued and missing.

The 365th got into an position in the Argonne forest, west of the town of Mirecourt, and the Germans and the Americans met with the signs of the struggle. The colored soldiers took over the front after the Americans had been withdrawn, and the Americans were about four miles from the great German fortresses.

The November 9 Armistice became official on November 11, but the 365th did not return to the front until the 12th.

Not long before the 12th, colored soldiers in the 365th fought in actions of re-captured sectors from the Germans.
