

26th of December for this port. Forced by the winds to the south of the island, she met on the 30th by an English frigate of 30 guns, whose commander ordered the Spaniard to send his boat, with his papers to the frigate. The Spanish commander answered that it was against his instructions to comply with such an order; the English commander told him then, that he would compel him with his guns; the Spaniard Manuel de Trelles, answered, that he was ready to accept the challenge, tho' only armed with 18 six pounders, and manned as packets generally are with thirty men. The English immediately poured their heavy metal on the Spanish ship, and a battle followed which lasted though wonderful it may appear, five hours and a half; when the Spanish ship having not one man left to do duty, ceased firing. The frigate then sent her boat on board the Spaniard, where the English stripped every man they found dead or alive, and abandoned the ship in that situation to the mercy of the waves.

"The brave Trelles, his lieutenant, and 17 men, lost their lives; whilst the remainder of his crew were all more or less wounded, except the surgeon, who is the man that sent the express with the news. The frigate lost a mast, with six men killed and seven wounded. The packet is almost a wreck, with her flag and pendant still hoisted; knowing that Spain was not at war with England, she put into Kingston, it being the nearest port to repair; they there found a Spanish brig of war, by which they forwarded the mail to Trinidad, in Cuba.

"This extraordinary affair has made a great deal of noise here; the name of the valourous Trelles resounds through every place. It cannot be denied that that action is as glorious for the Spaniards as shameful to the English."
