The London Herald's Correspondent.

The Army Correspondent of the London Herald is furnishing the Richmond Enquirer with copies of his letters giving accounts of the battles in Northern Virginia, in advance of their appearance in Europe. They are interesting, and but for their extreme length we should take pleasure in laying them in full before our readers. In the absence of space for the letters in extenso we copy the following extracts from his account of the great battle of the 12th of May, and the part enacted by some of the North Carolina troops:

On the 12th of May the battle field lay before dawn, enveloped in a hazy fog. At 4 o'clock in the morning of that day the hostile lines burst asunder the sudden bidding of an electric wire, into a fierce cannonade. An explo-ion in its suddenness, it rayed from the first moment of its opening, in the full depth of its fury. The metalic peal of the solid shot, the sharp clap and the first crash of the shell rose from side to side with rapidity. They seemed to shake the very earth with their thunders. That terrific storm, while undiminished in depth, underwent immediately after its first outburst a change in character; for the sharper peals of shot and shell were succeeded in a moment by the duller thuds, that hurling forward grape and canister, told of a struggle deepened into the steruness of close quarters.

The suddenness of the thunders with which the artillery rent the air was not greater than that with which the deafening storm burst from the infantry. The musketry that followed immediately after the very first gun, was so great in volume from its openings that it bespoke clearly the presence of large mas-The peals in quick succession of the artillery, did not drown its voice; but on it went distinetly, a flowing roar that rose to Heaven. like the constant outcry of a rushing river. Divination was not necessary with all those evidences to tell me, as I rose from my blanket in the rear, that, as in the case of our own conflict at Inkerman, an attack, prepared with deliberation in close proximity to the Confederate lines, had moved suddenly from the cover of the morning fog.

Gen. J. M. Jones' brigade occupied the salient. On the left of Jones' men were formed recollected, held the salient-rested on the brigade of Stuart. Such was the distribution on the morning of the 12th, behind the breastworks of Ewell's right wing, of the men constituting the division of Gen. Edward Johnston. Oh the right of this division was an unoccupied part of the works about two bundred yards in length, and further on that staunch brigade of Wilcox's division-Lane's. Such was the array and strength of Ewell's right on the morning of the 12th

Johnston, informed at 3 o'clock, A. M. that the enemy was massing in his front, sent off in hot haste for guns to replace those that had been removed from his works during the

Gen. Johnston had no sooner become aware nacy, as "Old Blucher."

The salient carried and one-balf of Jones' men killed, wounded or captured, the enemy poured through the Confederate line in immense force. The Stonewall brigade, on the Confederate ranks, became exposed on the right flank. Gen. Walker, its chief, attempted immediately to swing that wing around; but while in the act, was disabled by a very severe wound in the side. Pressed hotly by the Federal advance, that movement became then, after ever the brief delay consequent on that accident, impossible. The pressure upon its flank having commenced, many of the men was finally forced back; and what of it was neither captured, wounded nor killed, found protection behind the battle array of the brigade that had been in line on its left-Hays' Louisianians.

Steuart's brigade, on the right of the regiments that had occupied the salient, was tain flank. Those of them who were neither captured, killed or wounded, found shelter behind the brigade that had been in line upon their right-Lane's, of Wilcox's division .-Engaged in front with a heavy column of the enemy, Lane, on learning of the miscarriage at the salient, became alarmed for his left flank; and having immediately swung his line around almost squarely with the original poglory of being the first to stem the tide of Federal victory on the right. While the Stonewall brigade fought and fell Colonel, being in command, it confronted the wave of the enemy's triumph, surged up to attacks in front, to give the unrecovered that barrier; but, having broken upon it in space greater width. They still protruded mere spray, left the bonor of the arrest of its overflow on that side of the field to those honseless, landless warriors of Louisiana.

Between Hays' men on the one side, and Lane's on the other, the Federalists had driven all opposition from their path. For a width of a mile they had swept the works of their defenders; but, though complete masters within that limit, were confronted by an impassable barrier on the one hand and on the other. Pouring through the gap they had made, their masses formed rapidly from the right and from the left, with the view of turning the line of Hays on that side and Lane on this, by pressure on those officers' exposed flanks.

Apprehension of attack during the night on the front of Hays, had led to the transfer to its support of the fine brigade of Pegram. The other brigades of the division under the conmand of Gordon-two-were, at the time of the assault upon the salient, half a mile to the left. Springing forward without orders, Gordon moved at "double quick" in the direction of the fire that had burst upon the dawn in sudden thunders. Rushing into the fog, he could see neither friend nor foe; but, guided by the instincts of a soldier, still sped forward rapidly under the bidding of the battle's hoarsest roar. The thick haze into whose unkown depths he drove on, soon lit its murderous terrors, as he closed into the conflict, with lurid flashes; and, in the next moment, flung out a sheet of lightning that hurled about the ears of his advancing ranks a very tempest of bullets.

Gordon had come up in column. General R. D. Johnston'i Brigade, first upon the field, he threw rapidly into line, and hunching it against the enemy through the fog, checked the advance. Having arrested, thus, at one point, the surging ranks of the foe, he sought to stop him as they swept around his right. The torrent streaming rapidly in that direction, he was about to be borne back by the flank, when, brigging up his own brigade, its firm line preses of men. Rising in a deep roll, one and sented to the river-like rush an additional width unbroken, its blended ringing declared that of barrier The living flood of Federal triumph the hostile thousands from whom it swelled | dashing against it in vain, swept still farther up must have met in conflet, hand to hand. | around, again threatening the Confederate right with destruction under a rapid movement upon its flank. Gordon having by that time brought up his third brigade-Pegram's --- formed it under the command of Colonel Huffman; somewhat detached from the others, across the new front of the enemy's advance. The whole line then delivered a murderous volley into the dim masses of human life that stood before it shrouded -and very, very many of them winding-sheeted -in that morning fog. Instantly seizing the colors of the centre regiment of his own brigade, Gordon spurred forward under a storm of bullets, ordering a charge. His men rushed upon the misty ranks that they had just cut gashes the Stonewall, under Walker, and next in, through with their deadly fire. Their fury order of the line of battle, the Louisianians | bere down all resistance. The charge bad beunder Hays. The right of Jones-who, be it come a chase. Huddling the Federalists in headlong flight over the breastworks that had been held during the night by Steuart, that murderous race was continued for half a mile beyond. Opposition had disappeared before the pursuit; still, however, it held its way in unabated fury. Starting out suddenly from the fog upon a hostile force in line, Gordon's demand for surrender having, in the confusion of his sudden appearance, obtained no reply, the Federalists fell where they had but a moment before stood in lusty life, a battle array of dead

The enemy still held the ground he had won on Stuart's left. Gordon falling, therefore, back, occupied the works he had carried so gloriously. His charge had cost the Confederates the services for a time of Brigadier General R. D. Johnston. That gallant officer of the exact point of the attack than he rushed | was disabled by a wound that is, however, not towards the salient. He was too late. The very severe. Col. The Federalists continued to hold their ground in the salient; and along the line of immediate left of the gap thus opened in the works to the left of that angle within a short distance of the position of Monaghan's-Hays'- Phuisianians. Ramseur's North Carolinians of Rodes' division formed, covering Monaghan's right; and, ordered to charge, were received by the enemy with a stubborn resistance. The desperate character of the struggle along that brigade-front was told terribly in the hoarseness and rapidity of its musketry. So close was the fighting there for forced into disorder were killed, wounded or a time that the fire of friend and foe rose captured; tut several of the regiments wheel- up rattling in one common roar. The earthworks being at the moment in their immediate rear, they bounded to the opposite side; and, having thus placed them in their front, renewed the conflict. A rush of an instant brought Ramseur's fellows to this side of the defences; and, though they cretched close to the slopes, under enfilade from the guns of the salient, their ken by the surging masses of the Federalists | musketry raitled in deep and deadly fire on the enemy that stood in overwhelming numbers but a few yards from their front. Those brave North Carolinians had thus, in one of the very hottest conflicts of the day, succeeded in driving the enemy from the works that had been occupied during the previous night by a brigade which, until the 12th of May, had never yet yielded to a foe-the Stonewall.

The Confederate line had been re-establishsition, encountered the enemy's triumphant | ed by Ramseur to the position held during advance. Charging in fine style, he drove it the night by Gen. J. M.
