THE RIVER MAGDELENA.

Within two years, several attempts have been made to navigate the Magdelena, one of the rivers of Celombia, which rises in the direction of Begota, and runs, with a generally straight course, to the Northern coast of the ublic. We have before us some notes we took some months ago, con-taining a few facts communicated by a re fall and precise information N. Y. Daily Adv

The river Magdelena is destined to the river Magdelena is destined to become of the greatest importance to the Republic of Colombia, when the country shall become more populous, and the state of society sufficiently advanced to give activity to commerce. Its course is directed by the parallel ridges of the Andes, by which its values is bounded generally at a consider. lev is bounded, generally at a considerable distance from the shores. It is navig ble for vessels of considerable size to Honda, about nine hundred miles— which is about the distance the Bolivar penetrated; but, hitherto, the little trade which has been carried on by the inhab-itages, has been performed in boats, at great disadvantages and to but little

For a great part of its course, the Magdelena is bounded by plains, over-grown with an almost impenetrable forest, and frequently so low as to be over-flowed whenever the water is swelled by floods. The inhabitants are few, d almost all of Indian descent. Their huls are usually scattered in the forest, or collected in a few small and miser-able villages near the shore, where they live in the same ignorant and bars state as ever.

The insurmountable obstacles which the Spaniards placed in the way of comnerce, and the rigor with which they sterdicted the visits of foreigners, left is majestic river inaccessible to civilation, and the world in ignorance of the regions through which it flows. In-eed, what has been often felt with redeed, what has been often felt with regard to all South America, may be with peculiar justice remarked of this river—that the revolution has been a second discovery of the continent, and Bolivar has, in no small measure, completed for the world what Spain permitted Columbus only to begin. As far as circumstances will permit, the present Government have adopted a course precisely the oppsite of the Spanish system.

A report was made by the Minister of the Interior, four or five years ago, in which a sketch was presented of the commercial condition of the Republic. It was then quite dangerous for strangers to attempt the navigation of the Magdelena, in consequence of the jealousy of the Indian boatmen, who viewed every experiment as a direct interference with their rights, and would not scruple to fight and murder on every such occasion. The navigation was at that time very nucertain, and the few articles of merchandise risked on the river were exposed to great lesses by river were exposed to great losses by the carelessness and thieving of the na-ion of the unigent, the Congress granted an exclusive privilege for the navigation of the riter in steambants, for a term of the river in strambouts, for a term of years, to a foreigner; which, in consequence of his failure to comply with the terms, and his subsequent death, has been declared cancelled. It is to be based that some course may be pursued by which the object will be effected, and that without the sacrifices inseparable from such a monopoly. The experience of Captain Sherman, we should think, would be sufficient to encourage the enterprise of other steamcourage the enterprise of other steamvigable for nine hundred miles, and p:rformed the passage up in three months, one third of which time be unfortunately had to spend on a sand flat, where he was left aground by a sudden fall of water. This is one of the acci-dents to which the navigation of the Magde'ena is exposed, and which re-quires the greatest caution. The moun-tains from which the tributory streams are derived, often pour down such floods as to raise the river twelve or lifteen feet in a single night. In consequence of the peculiar character of many tracts of country on the shores, the water is frequently drained off with as much rapidity as the floods come on: for when it once breaks through the banks, the land is so low, that the surplus water leaves the chan-nel, and produces a fall no less sudden than the flood. These frequent changes with the rapidity of the current, are besides continually changing the bed of the river, by deepening it in some places, and making sand banks and islands in others. The least obstruction immediately causes a deposition of sand. In a few minutes after striking the ground, the Bolivar had a bar formed below from a depth of three or four feet, to the surface of the water. A little labor would be sufficient in many cases to strengthen the banks of the river, and keep the water from overflowing large tracts of land; but it will never be done by the present population alone. There were about thirty passengers on board the Bolivar, who, in a country where travelling is so difficult and laborious, were glad to pay what we should consider large prices, for the passage in the steamboat. In consequence, however, of the unfortunate detention on the shoal, or ratner on account of the poverty of the inhabitants, they experienced not a little difficulty in obtaining supplies of provisions. Among the animals they were able to kill in the forests were monkeys, considerable numbers of which were eaten on board, being considered wholesome, and not disagreeable food. The great rapid in the river, about seven hundred miles from its mouth, which is never passed without difficulty and danger in the boats of the natives, was surmounted by the Bolivar on each side, that it was with great difficulty the boatman were able to find a sufficient footing to drag their boats against the stream. They step slowly along on the margin of the water, with the rocks rising on one side, and the fear of alligators on the other, occasionally fastening their ropes to the stones, and toiling on with great labor. The water looks black, and is apparently very deep at that place, but the rapidity of the current would not allow a lead to reach the bottom.

The shores of the Magdelena are in some places much infested by the South American tigers. These animals are sometimes large, and are fierce and dangerous; but the Indians have a mode of killing them, in which they are very expert, and which affords a test of their boldness and self possession. An English naturalist on board the Bolivar, expressed a wish to obtain the head of one of these savage animals, and an Indian offered to gratify him for the small reward of a dollar. So taking a piece of spoiled beef in a bag, a short lance in his hand, and with his long knife stuck at his side, he jumped into the water and swam to the shore. After penetrating a little way into the forest, he made a fire on the ground, and began to roast the meat, by the smell of which a large tiger was soon attracted, and, on approaching the place, crawled slowly towards him on his belly, like a cat watching s mouse. These things were observed from a safe distance by some of the passengers, who were still more astonished at the sequel. The Indian was seated by the fire, as the tiger moved slowly on, with the bag laid over the roasting meat, his knife at his side, and the sharp lance, about three feet long, in his hand, with its butt on the ground, by his foot, and the point raised to a when within springing distance, he snatched away the bag; and the tiger, as if fearing he was removing the meat, couched and sprang directly towards him. With the greatest coolness, however, the Indian received him on the point of his spear, which penetrated his chest, and past through his back; and, then, with a dextrous management of the weapon, threw him over his back, and drawing his long keen knife, in-atantly cut off his head!

The Augusta Chronicle gives the following particulars relative to the death of Joseph Martin, for which Henry Shultz and Alexander Boyd have been arrested:

a gig, and informed a respectable gen-tleman whom they met there, that they had been robbed, a short distance be-hind, by a negro boy, who had taken a trunk from behind the gig, and fied with it into the bushes, while they pur-sued, but were unable to overtake him. They expressed suspicions that be had carried it to a wagon which they had passed on the road, and after many en-treaties, the gentleman went there, and reaties, the gentleman went there, and found a white man, named Joseph Martin, and a negro boy answering to the de-scription given by the females. Martin declared positively that the boy had not been out of his sight since they ar-rived there; but after some parley, the gentleman brought the boy with him, and he was identified by the females, who afterwards awore that he was the one who took their trunk. After questioning him aside, he acknowledged that he had taken it, and offered to go and give it up, but the gentleman, who exercised towards him the utmost mildness, thinking that he might possibly be influenced by fear, cautioned him not give way to such alarm: but, on his describing the trunk, according to the information given by the owner, his doubts at once subsided, and he went with him to the place where he stated that it was. No trunk, however, was there. Whether the boy was whipped then or not, we are unable to say; but, if we recollect rightly, he was, either at that time or afterwards. However, he then stated, that he had taken the trunk at the request of Martin, and that it must have been removed by him. Martin positively denied any knowledge of it, but came with the negro to Hamburg, and stayed there all night. A warrant was issued against him and the boy, and the general impression then, accompanied by strong marks of indignation, was that Martin was concerned.

On the following morning. Mr. Shultz, who as it afterwards appeared in evidence, was anxious that the trunk should should be returned-actuated by friendly motives to Martin, made an appeal to his feelings, which was supposed to have had the desired effect, and agreeably to the wish of Mr. S. he went with him, Mr. Alexander Boyd, Mr. David Lynar, and the negro boy, with a promise that he would assist them to look for the trunk, and also endeavor to make the boy find it. He caried them to severa' different places to no purpose, and Mr. : . lz, (as said to be stated by himself) supposing that he was pre-vericating, and being fatigued and wet with the rain, became exasperated, and proceeded to violence by whipping ducking; and to such an extent and was this barbarity carried by him and the others, that it is said the poor fellow fainted several times, and in the ducking swallowed a large quantity of mud & water. When they were discovered, Martin was lying almost senseless with his head extended over a ditch-Mr. gentleman who had performed the first voyage in that river by steam, in the steamboat Bolivar, which are not destitute of interest, in the absence of rocks, so near the water, and so steep with a grape-vine switch frizzled at the end, and Lynar was at a distance with the negro in his custedy. Martin was brought to Hamburg, and his person exhibited the most shameful proofs of barbarity, being so lacerated that he had scarcely a sound place upon it. Mr. Shultz'expressed afterwards the utmost contrition for the offence-took the wounded man to his own house, sent for a Doctor, and treated him with every attention. He was afterwards removed by his father to the tavern of Mr. Tatom, and there died on the evening of Sunday last. It is here proper to mention that the physicians who attended him did not anticipate his death till very shortly before it happened- he was attacked with a high grade of bilious fever—the extreme heat of the weather must have operated against him severey, and he was much disturbed by those who were led by curiosity to examine his wounds. Mr. Lynar has since fled from his bail, and has not yet been taken, and Mr. Shultz and Mr. Boyd were carried to Edgefield Jail on Monday last. The circumstances attending the departure of Mr. Shultz moved many of the stoutest hearts and enlisted the deepest simpathies of those around him-even they who had partaken of the excitement against him, or had been previously his personal enemics. All wished him surrendered to justice, but when they saw him unresistingly bound in cords, & weeping like a child, in all the agony of humility and despair-him who had borne so many extreme reverses of fortune with a degree of figuress and unaltered preservance which indicated almost an iron heart, they were deeply overcome, and many turned aside to hide the tears they could not repress. Many of the most respectable and wealthy citizens stepped forward and begged Mr. Tatom that he might be untied, and offered themselves as guards on the way to Jail, but the request was not granted. They then of-fered Mr. Shultz their purses and responsibility, so far as comfort was concerued; but he told them, no-that he did not desserve their commisseration, for that he had disgraced himself-that a Jail was his proper place, and that he would not be relieved from it, even if it were in their power to bail him. In speaking of his offence, he placed it in the most odious light, and seemed disposed to draw upon himself all the guilt of those concerned with him.

Thus moved off, in ignominy and bondage, one who has, for many years, astonished thousands with the powers On the evening of Monday, the 30th of his mind, and the vast effects of his lives.
