

Uncle Sam was almost every day pestered for money to pay for some improvement or other in the boys' farms.

This raised a terrible hue and cry among the boys, who threatened to disinherit the old man, and set up for themselves.

By and by came another of this hopeful family, with a long story of the great advantage Uncle Sam would derive from clearing out a ditch.

Here the great big fellow mentioned before, who was the richest of his brothers, put in his ear, and cried out—

Then came a fine fellow, one of the young fry, who wanted to persuade Uncle Sam to pony up for a lane he was about making.

"Thunder and blarney!" exclaimed three or four of the elder brothers all at once, "haven't we made our own roads at our own cost and without asking daddy for a cent?"

"Goodly gracious!" at length cried Uncle Sam, throwing up his eyes, "goodly gracious! what can be the matter with these boys? I believe they want to eat me up as if I was a live fish I was as poor as Job's turkey."

Now all that was required for Uncle Sam to be just as he wished, was to let his boys have all his money, as to let
