democratic principle we claim to cherish."

What does Billy think about the way Negroes and whites would get along? He thinks the children will get along fine. He isn't so sure how the adults will like it. "But," he says simply, "they'll just have to get used to it."

Of course, it can't be as simple a sell that, but Billy should know something about adjusting. He had a lot of it to do.

Why, then should there be any difficulty in helping children adjust to a non-segregated situation? The answer, of course, is in the parents and their attitudes. Though the majority of the people actually favor the non-segregated set-up, the minority in this cast, as in many such cases, has been extremely noisy, some of them remain defiant.

Not every Virginian feels the same as Rev. Thomas V. Barrett, rector of Robert E. Lee Memorial Episcopal Church in Lexington who said ".... there ought not to be one Christian who does not rejoice that the highest court in the land has handed down this momentous decision, which is in clear accord with every right Christian principle we know and every
