

Former White House Economic Advisor Credits Public Opinion With Softening Defense Budget

One of the nation's leading economists said at North Carolina College recently that "public agitation" had "moderated" the Department of Defense's budget demands.

Dr. Edwin G. Nourse, former chief of the Council of Economic Advisors to Ex-President Harry S. Truman, added "the agitation may have also moderated the attitude of the President himself."

He praised the public for expressing concern over budget hikes.

Delivering two speeches to Dr. T. R. Speigner's Resource Use Education Workshop, the former Truman economist defended the economic policies of his former chief.

Dr. Nourse told the NCC News Bureau, "I think Mr. Truman in his fiscal policies was more conservative than F.D.R. Mr. Truman, in my opinion, generally approached fiscal matters in a conservative manner."

The economist attributed high budget demands to jealousies within the Armed Services.

He said he had personal reasons to believe the Russians aren't ahead of the U. S. in the nuclear arms race. Service jealousies, however, prevent the public from getting a clear picture of international atomic developments.

Dr. Nourse added, "If it can be shown that an extreme arms race program is no longer necessary, then administration sources can shift their attention to building a strong welfare program at home."

At the end of the 1955-1956 school year, Dr. Seabrook retired from the Presidency of the Fayetteville State Teachers College, an institution he had served for 34 years — eleven years as dean and 23 as the school's president. Dr. Seabrook was called out of retirement last fall and agreed to fill the Smith post as Acting President for one year.

Dr. Seabrook has lost none of his zest for the improvement of education and of community life. He serves on a variety of educational, religious, and civic boards and his advice has long been sought on problems of many types. With people of many races and types, he has established himself as a gentleman and a scholar.

Upon the occasion of his retirement from the Presidency of the Fayetteville State Teachers College, one North Carolina weekly commented: "As for Dr. J. Ward Seabrook, he may retire because of years, but he will never be an old man as long as he lives". And he went on to say that Dr. Seabrook, having served two colleges as president, Dr. Seabrook has made no statement as to his future plans.
