PROPHECIES OF MODERATES

of conflicting ideas to the point where no action at all is possible. About the only creative effort the moderates can produce is verbal, like the soothing syrup spooned out by governor Collins, who explained his position to the AP writer thusly:

"My statements have dealt with basic principles, reflecting my own basic attitudes and thinking of long standing, and have been calculated to encourage our people to develop a sound and constructive attitude, based upon calm thought and understanding."

Denied the field of activity by their own philosophy, the moderates are ill-equipped to visualize the handling of a serious problem like desegregation which defies treatment in the moderation method. Their moderation dogma which stresses only the partial truth will not permit them to see the whole truth, therefore it is easy to see how they can paint nothing but a black picture for the South in the area of desegregation. And just as they are prevented from seeing the broad perspective, they cannot lead their constituents nor give direction to them in this touchy area. In fact, they are more led than leading.

The real danger in men like Hodges and Collins is that they create a fashion in the ruling circles which spreads out to influence the most remote individuals. What is worse, they serve to convince the rest of the country that the best course for the South to follow is one that is half right and half wrong. But the biggest factors accounting for the resistance to desegregation in the South is traceable to men like them, who stand for doing nothing in moving toward complete extension of freedom and democracy to everybody.
