Idea Must Hurdle Huge Legal Block

Lincoln hospital's hopes of erecting a 150 unit housing project near the Urban Renewal areas was viewed this week as an attempt by the hospital administration to obtain a source of revenue to help the institution's hard pressed finances.

But those hopes will have to wind through a series of legal difficulties which might be sufficient to kill them, observers reported this week.

The Durham Morning Herald disclosed the hospital's intentions to back a housing project on Wednesday.

The daily newspaper report said the matter had been taken up by the hospital's trustee board at its annual meeting last week.

However, hospital officials refused to comment on the issue. Lincoln administrator Frank Scott would not comment on the subject but refused to say that the Herald report was false.

According to the Herald report, the hospital's housing units would not be in the urban renewal area but would be close to the area and designed to accommodate persons displaced by the project.

The Durham Housing Authority has already announced plans for 200 units of public housing for the area, and authority for the erection of 450 others has been granted by the Public Housing Administration.

In the hospital should be able to complete its plans for erecting a housing project, it would be the first private housing planned for the area.

The need for increased funds to operate the hospital is believed to be the thinking behind the hospital Trustees plans for erecting a housing unit.

The hospital could use the revenues collected from lease of the 150 unit structure to add to its operating budget.

The hospitals in the case are Moses Cone Memorial and Wesley Long Community hospital. Both were built partially with funds made available from the government through the Hill-Burton act.

The Negro plaintiffs sued the hospitals for their refusals to permit Negro doctors to the hospital staffs and refusal to admit the physicians' patients.

The government had joined the suit in an effort to have the Hill-Burton act ruled unconstitutional. Judge Stanley refused, stating that his court lacked jurisdiction.

Judge Stanley's ruling said that because the hospitals had made various contacts with the federal government, they did not become agencies or instruments of the government and that they remained under private control, free from Constitutional prohibitions against See NEE-NOV, 8-A
