Coleus that grows so well in shaded places outdoors needs a sunny spot indoors in winter, but will thrive in either place. Pot small plants now or cut stems and place in water.

Coleus is a versatile plant which grows as well indoors as it does outdoors. Gardeners can take advantage of this fact by potting up small plants of coleus in fall to bring indoors for winter color. Do this early enough so the plants may be left outdoors for about 10 days to adjust to the transplanting.

If all the coleus plants in the garden are large, there's another way to handle them. Pick or cut off stems that have leaves of your favorite colors or color combinations and place them in deep bowls or vases filled with water.

Once indoors, coleus is handled the same way whether growing in soil or placed in water. The plants must be set in a sunny window, for their bright foliage colors depend on light. Away from it the leaves become pale.

The pieces of coleus in water have, of course, all the moisture they need, but the plants in pots must be watered thoroughly at least every other day in order to grow their best.

In due course of time some of the pieces of coleus growing in water may develop roots. These pieces may be left as they are or potted after they have roots several inches long.

While coleus is grown primarily for its beautiful and var-colored foliage, its flowers are pretty too — spikes of pale lavender blooms. Should these develop and open indoors, they add extra interest to the winter window garden.
