Negro Leader Calls Right-to-Work Laws Industrial Jim Crow

In a fighting speech before the California Negro Leadership Conference recently, Civil Rights Leader Bayard Rustin lashed out at right-to-work laws as a stratagem to divide the labor movement and to keep Negroes at the bottom of the economic ladder. "Right to work," he said, "is the same as Open Shop and Industrial Jim Crow, and no matter how you dress it up it is the same weapon that was used to kill trade union organization in the early part of the twentieth century, the same weapon used to deny minorities their economic rights."

Rustin's remarks came in the course of a reply to Reed Larson, Executive Director of the National Right to Work Committee, in a debate on February 18 before the California Negro Leadership Conference in San Francisco. The Executive Director of the A. Philip Randolph Institute stressed the need for labor and civil rights organizations to unify against right to work laws by pointing to the common experience of both movements: "Labor and minority groups have been where the real action is—the bullets, the dogs, the lynchings, the billy clubs, blood dripping down through the leaves of the trees, and blood running out of the open shop. This makes us brothers not only under the skin, but also brothers in blood, in sweat, and in tears, all shed in the service of making America safe for democracy."

Rustin brought five major charges against right-to-work laws: (1) They violated the letter and spirit of the Constitution; (2) They destroyed union democracy and the institution of collective bargaining; (3) The perpetuated poverty; (4) They were anti-civil rights; and (5) They were supported by every racist and rightist movement in America. The advocates of right-to-work laws, he said, "have been opposed to every social and economic reform that would benefit Negroes and workers," and therefore "it was no accident that the plight of Negroes was worst in States with right-to-work laws."

Rustin said that the only genuine right-to-work situation would come about when the society provided conditions of full employment. Here he called upon the labor movement to end the discrimination that still persisted in some of its minority segments, since only a united and democratic labor movement could help bring about full employment. "The only way to guarantee this kind of right to work," he said, "is for Negroes and the Unions to work together. We cannot do it by ourselves, and the economy cannot do it without us. We both have got to weld a great coalition to solve the problems of jobs, education, housing. We have got to make our movement come to represent the majority will of the American society and help it move on to massive and planned social investments to end slums, inferior schools, and depression rates of employment."

He said he was in favor of right to work in the sense that President Franklin Roosevelt was, namely, that "this society should guarantee every worker a job at decent wages with security and dignity; and if the private sector does not fulfill this task, then it must be the automatic, legal obligation of the public sector to do so."

BILL FOR BUNNIES

New Zealand's bill for rabbit-control work amounts to more than $4 million a year, the Catholic Digest finds. The country lacks the insects to act as agents in spreading the virus myxomatosis, successfully introduced from Brazil by scientists in once-plagued Australia.
