Studying of Aging Being Made by Scientists

WASHINGTON, D. C.—Does anyone ever die of just plain old age? If all diseases were curable, and no one was killed in accidents, how long would we live? Is there some point at which the body would wear out and simply give up? Would such wearing out take place at age 100, 150, 200?

Scientists trying to answer these questions first have to define aging. In the absence of disease, what changes take place as the individual gets older? The next question is, what causes these changes? And the ultimate question: Can anything prevent or delay these changes?

The National Society for Medical Research points out that laboratory animals, always important in scientific research, are indispensable in the study of aging. The animals' diet and other environmental factors can be controlled, but most important, the researcher will outlive his experimental subjects. The relatively short life-span of most animals permits birth-to-death developmental studies which are not feasible in humans.

Such animal studies have indicated several possible explanations for the aging process: We may eat ourselves to death; something causes body cells to release substances which di-
