aging changes and enzyme levels during their life-span. At death the various organs are observed for gross microscopic changes. These changes are then compared to see if the varying diets caused any difference in the aging of the animals.

The older individual has fewer cells in his body than when he was younger. The only sign that a cell is getting older and approaching death is a characteristic pigment found in aging tissue. Cells carry their own "suicide sacs," structures called lysosomes. Lysosome enzymes digest cells after death. In the aging cell, the lysosome enzymes are apparently released and digest some of the cell material around them, leaving a brown pigment.

There have been reports that a drug centrophoxine, favorably affected mental functioning in elderly people. Dr. Geoffrey Bourne of Emory University, Atlanta, gave the drug to old guinea pigs and found that the aging pigment in their brains disappeared.

Irradiated animals age prematurely; for the most part they die at a young age of diseases which usually kill older animals. Irradiation may affect aging because it induces the formation of types of chemical compounds known as "free radicals." Finding these compounds in irradiated animals led to the thought that free radicals also play some part in the aging of normal animals. None of these studies is likely to enable us live forever, but at least we may know why we won't.
