Says This Is No Time For Retrenchment

WASHINGTON, D. C. — The pace of Southern school desegregation continues to be slow, the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights reported this week as it called for steps to strengthen enforcement of school desegregation guidelines.

"This cannot be a time for retrenchment or wavering of purpose," the six members of the Commission said. "We do not believe that further delay in securing rights so fundamental as the right to equal educational opportunity will serve the real interests of any citizen or of the Nation."

In releasing the report, William L. Taylor, Staff Director of the Commission, said: "Although it does not receive as much publicity as in previous years, violence against Negroes continues to be a deterrent to school desegregation."

Taylor noted that in six of the 63 school districts in the 14 Southern and border States visited by the Commission staff, "we found that shots had been fired into the dwellings of Negro school children" who had exercised their option to attend previously all-white schools. "The districts we visited were not selected because of any complaints of violence," Taylor added.

In the report, Southern School Desegregation, 1966-67, the Commission noted that "the vast majority (more than 75 percent) of Negro children in the South still are being denied the rights declared to be theirs by the Supreme Court's decision in the school segregation cases and the Civil Rights Act of 1964." More than 2 1/2 million Negro pupils still attend all-Negro schools in the 14 Southern and border States, See COMMISSION 2A
