Senator Edmund Muskie Appoints Young Att'y To Key Senate Job

WASHINGTON, D. C. — In this nation's capital where laws are made that affect the lives of every American, it's seldom that one hears about the men behind the spotlight who play an integral role in shaping up the legislation.

Black attorney Tyrone Brown, only 28, has the distinction of being one of the few members of his race who've ever directed a major U.S. Senate Committee, having been appointed as Staff Director of the Intergovernmental Relations Subcommittee by Senator Edmund S. Muskie.

A former East Orange, N.J., track star who graduated from Cornell University Law School with honors, Brown is rated by his associates as "having a cool and calculating mind", a trait that the job demands.

Currently handling Senate business on the Revenue Sharing proposals which is before the body, Brown realizes that his input can drastically affect minorities in the nation's largest cities. If passed by the 100-member Senate, the final bill can result in the poor, both white and black, in the innercities getting a bigger share of the action that can better their lifestyle. One of the key bills before the Subcommittee is one introduced by Senator Muskie.

The mild-mannered, bespectacled attorney came to the job with impressive credentials. Starting off as a volunteer in Rural Development, American Friends Service Committee

By JOHN MYERS, Staff Writer
Even in Durham, hunger exist. In the Fayetteville Street Project and in the Hayti area, there are hungry children. Now, there is something being done about it. UOCI, under the direction of Charles Tillman, Hatti Farrar, Pearl Bledsoe, Mary Walker, Rodney O'Neil, Vivian Gunn, and Delphine Campbell, 20-70 children, who otherwise might spend their mornings hungry, have a bacon and egg breakfast.

From 10-12 a.m., five days a week, in the old Malcom X University building on E. Pettigrew Street, these children are fed bacon, eggs, bread, and milk. They may experience hunger during the latter portion of the day, but they do not begin the morning with it.

Miss Hattie Farrar, spokesman for UOCI Breakfast Program, told me the funds for the breakfasts come from donations and their funds are limited. She asked that anyone wishing to help finance this program, send their donations to UOCI Breakfast Program, E. Pettigrew Street, Durham. Miss Farrar said the program began June 23 and will continue until August 31, when the children return to school. After that date, she is not sure how it will be carried out, if at all.

AIDING U. S. SENATORS—Attorney Tyrone Brown, the only Black staff Director of a United States Senate Committee, discusses pending legislation with U.S. Senator Edmund S. Muskie, who appointed him to the post.
