Saturday, Oct. 21 1972 THE CALL MA TIMES-SA 10 1000 By JOHN F. J. CLARK, M.D.

We described what happens when a mother whose blood is RH negative is carrying a baby who inherits RH positive blood from its father. Nothing happens when their bloods don't come in contact. If their bloods do get mixed, antibodies in the mother destroy the red blood cells in the baby. How is this treated? First. the doctor tests the mother to see if she is producing antibodies. Then he will check her blood periodically to learn whether the concentration of antibodies is high or low. In most RH cases, the concentration is low enough to permit a normal delivery of the baby/ However, if the concentration of antibodies rises above a certain point, the physician must check the exact status of the baby's response to the mother's antibodies. This is done by taking a small amount of fluid from the amniotic sac, or "water bag" which envelops the baby inside the uterus. Analysis of the fluid tells the doctor if the baby is producing too many partially formed or primitive red cells. When the test show the infant's blood to be damaged seriously, a number of things can be done, depending on the seriousness of the damage. Most often, the pregnancy is allowed to go to completion and then the newborn infant is supplied with fresh blood by a process called exchange transfusion. This is a gradual replacement of damaged blood with normal negative blood.

pears that the baby may not

In some cases when it ap-

make it to the final weeks of pregnancy, the baby is delivered early. Labor is brought or (induced) a week or two before the expected dilivery date. Most of these babies then have the exchange blood transfusion.

In a small number of cases. when neither of these methods will help the baby to survive until delivery is safe, a technique has been developed to change the baby's blood while it is still inside the mother's uterus. This is called a fetal transfusion. It is not dangerous. There is usually no discomfort to the mother and no harm to the baby. Probably, it will save the life of the baby.

Researchers have long been looking for a means of preventing an RH negative mother from producing antibodies a-gainst her baby's RH positive blood. In the past three years an effective immunization for this purpose has come into use. The mother must be immunized within 72 hours after her baby is born and from then, on after every delivery or abortion in order to keep her immunity.

Women who have become sensitive to their own RH antihodies must not be immunized. There is a test which shows this.

Hospitals usually ask the RH negative mother to sign a form giving permission for the RH immunization to be given to her after her haby is born. To protect herself and any future children she might have, she would be sure to sign it.
