Mammoth Campaign Launched To End Lead Paint Poisoning

Three major health organizations today issued a joint statement calling for a public awareness campaign to eliminate the problem of lead-based paint poisoning through efforts on both the federal and local levels. The American Academy of Pediatrics, the American Public Health Association, and the National Environment Health Association said a nationwide publicity and information campaign would be undertaken through their joint memberships to increase public health community to seek total eradication of lead-based paint poisoning. "As physicians and public health workers, we are distressed to seek the needless waste of human life and potential caused by this seriously crippling malady," the joint statement read in part. "We are especially anguished because we have the knowledge to locate and treat these children before they suffer effects that will last a lifetime, yet society has not made a commitment to use that knowledge."
