black students to prepare for medical training.
Quoting from the brief, Maass and Rabbi Hertzberg urged that "programs designed to augment the numbers of disadvantaged minority individuals attending professional schools should not await the professional school threshold. The initiative must begin much earlier."
They added: "We believe that vigorous efforts should be made at the junior high school level to identify promising disadvantaged students especially in poor neighborhoods and in schools with large minority group enrollments, so as to provide at this early stage the necessary guidance for them to plan for professional careers."

"On the senior high school level, there is need for additional federally-funded remedial programs, such as Upward Bound and College Discovery, to stimulate and to assist students who appear to have the capabilities for professional careers but who, because of limiting economic and cultural circumstances, may have no such aspirations or prospects."
In the Bakke case, a white student, Allan Bakke, was denied admission to the University of California Medical School although black students with lower grades and test scores were admitted under a quota system for minorities. The Supreme Court, which has heard argument on the case, is expected in their brief in the case supporting Mr. Bakke, the American Jewish Committee argued that racially restrictive quotas were unconstitutional. to rule on the legality of such admission quota system.
