

FOXBORO, MASS. — CALLS IT A CAREER Vikings' DE Jim Marshall packs away his helmet after playing his final game with the Vikings against the Patriots at Schaefer Stadium on December 16. Marshall, who turned 42 on December 30, is the first non-QB to play in 20 NFL seasons. Only George Blanda (26) and Earl Morrall (21) have outdistanced him in this category. The Patriots won the game 27-23. (UPI Photo)

Rusk Says

Mr. Secretary? ... he asked me 'where can I get a haircut? ...' the professor repeated solemnly before the silent commission.

"... Some of these former diplomats are now prime ministers and presidents of their countries... and people wonder why they hate us..." the third ranking U.S. public official declared, in referring to the anti-American outbreaks in the Middle East (Iran) and north Africa (Libya).

However, the former secretary of state during Presidents John F. Kennedy's and Lyndon Johnson's administrations emphasized that the U.S. did not have the constitutional or legal authority to return the Shah of Iran to his country for trial in order to free American hostages.

There is no law providing for the ouster of immigrants seeking asylum or for the extradition of persons charged as criminals in Iran because "we do not have a treaty with Iran... Only the president can make that decision..." Rusk declared.

"I don't know if this point has been overlooked or ignored..." he continued. Although he was critical of U.S. Senators, international visitors and even reporters for "interfering in U.S. foreign policy" during the crisis, Rusk said, "If I had a choice between a free press and free speech aimed at a specific target such as peace... and a free press and free speech without restrictions, I would prefer a free press... without restrictions."

Rusk agreed that much of the Iranian crisis involved a propaganda battle by the Ayatollah Khomeini and his supporters to get their point of view on the former Shah's activities across to the American public.

In one of the U.S.-UN-SCO sessions considering a U.S. policy toward the demands of "Third World" countries for greater control over the contents and methods of distributing news media services in their countries, Commissioner Luis Lauro, former mayor of Miami, urged that representatives of Third World peoples be invited to future sessions of the U.S. commission.

Lauro spoke after Sunni Khalid, a Howard University student invited to observe the deliberations, rose to denounce U.S. position proposed during a session on new mass communications technology.

Khalid said a paper presented by Dr. Ithiel de Sola Pool of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology was "trash and garbage... and insulting to the peoples of the Third World... by referring to them as backwards and savage..."

In his paper, described as "provocative" by other commissioners, Pool stated "Development communication and the development of the indigenous media hardly gained as Iran shifted from a country penetrated by foreign influences to one shut off in Islamic fundamentalism. Nor has Ethiopia moved towards development goals or improved internal communication as it cut itself off from foreign communication."

SAT., JANUARY 5, 1979

Pool went on "to say... the political leaders of the Third World are often corrupt, incompetent and unsophisticated... It is merely to say once more that the countries are underdeveloped: that is what must be cured..."

Following the remarks, Ladonna Harris, president of Americans for Indian Opportunity, also took the floor to urge that local commissioners for UNESCO become more sensitive to the views of nonwhite minorities in the U.S. since many of these people are linked to Third World minorities through the
