City Schools Adopt New Student Record Policy

Trellie L. Jeffers

The Durham City School Board adopted a new student records policy to comply with the Educational Right to Privacy Act on its first reading at the regular board meeting, Monday night, October 13.

The records policy, recommended by City Schools superintendent Cleveland Hammonds, was designed to protect the students' and parents' right to privacy in the handling of students' records in a public institution. It includes provisions for locale of records, fees for a copy of the records, the use of the records and the school district procedures for searching the records for the purpose of having undesirable to both parents and students removed.

The new records policy will permit parents and students to examine the records during the pupil's sixth, eighth, and twelfth year in school.

Dr. Hammonds said that notices would be published in the local newspaper each year at the beginning of school, and that notes would be sent home to parents concerning the availability of records to be examined. Hammonds also said that if the pupils' records are in more than one place, the principal(s) will make the records accessible, and if necessary, will try to adjust a time to review the records that is convenient to both the parents and students.

The School Board was also given a review of the Police Safety Liaison Program by officer Talmadge W. Lassiter and several other policemen from the Durham Police Department.

The Police Safety Liaison Program which was rejected by the Durham City School Board a few years ago, was recently reintroduced by Ms. Beth Upchurch, a member of the Board. Mrs. Upchurch said, in expressing an interest in the police program, that she had always been taught that policemen protected her and that they were her friends.

The police officers, speaking at Monday night's meeting, said that they were part of the Liaison program in the Durham County Schools, and they sought to convince the other Board members that they had been successful in dispelling the "TV cops and robbers image" among the pupils at the county school where the program exists.

Dr. Bobby Collins, vice-principal, said that the program had brought about a closer relationship between police officers, and the students in both counseling and advisory positions.

Dr. Lawrence questioned the validity of having policemen rather than trained psychologists counsel students, and Mrs. Clement questioned the policemen's training for professional counseling.

Dr. Hammonds also expressed his concern for a clause in the police liaison proposal that states "command and control of disciplinary problems rest solely with the liaison officer and his commander." Officer Lassiter said that this clause referred only to serious felonies and that minor disciplinary problems came under the jurisdiction of the principal at the school where the program exists.

Dr. Hammond received permission from the School Board to make a recommendation on the Police Safety Liaison Program at the next regular School Board meeting. A Career Awareness Program was also introduced to the Board by Attorney John Plummer of Washington, D.C.
