Many Uses For Scented Geraniums

CHAPEL HILL — Scented geraniums always have been favored as house plants, and locally they are favored for container gardening on the patio or deck.

Scented and potted geraniums are not true geraniums, but pelargoniums from South Africa. The native plant, called crane's bill or wild geranium, is one of the true geraniums.

One of the most obvious differences between geraniums and pelargoniums is the strong scent of the pelargoniums, leaves. The distinctive, strong odor of the African geraniums may be associated with hot, sunny summer days, but scented geraniums have many more scents — rose, apple, lemon, lime, apricot, strawberry, coconut, peppermint, to name a few.

The scented geraniums were originally taken by sailors from the Cape of Good Hope to Europe, and were used as house plants and astringents. They also were used — and still are — in cooking. Colonial housewives brought them to the United States and used the tender leaves to replace imported flavorings such as cinnamon, nutmeg and vanilla, especially during the Revolutionary War. Later, they were used in jellies, cakes and potpourri.

The more than 75 distinct varieties are divided into six main categories — rose, citrus, mint, fruit, spice and nut — with many variations of leaf shape, flower, color and flavor.

These interesting and varied scents can be captured by bruising the leaves, heating them or placing them into direct contact with an absorbent material such as butter or sugar. Almost any herb cookbook has a selection of recipes calling for scented geranium leaves.

Those who discover a favorite scented geranium should plan to keep it year-round. During the summer months, it will be happy in a sunny spot in well-drained soil, kept not too wet and not overfertilized.

At summer's end, stem cuttings can be taken to make smaller plants survive winter in a bright window, since these tender perennials usually will not live through winters. Scented geraniums may be enjoyed now and throughout the year.

New Non-Vented Stove Fits Anywhere

One of the newest technological breakthroughs in kitchen appliances is an electric downdraft cooktop and grill which does not have to be vented outside of the house. The development enables homeowners to place the electric downdraft cooktop and grill anywhere in the kitchen without running costly ductwork to the exterior.

In addition, it opens downdraft cooking and grilling to people who previously could not take advantage of it, including residents of high rise buildings and areas where outside venting is illegal.

Replacing the costly ductwork is an easy-to-install ductless filtering system which fits in the cabinet under the cooktop. What little smoke is emitted is drawn down into the filtering system under the cabinet. A compact enclosure with a series of charcoal filters eliminates the remaining smoke, cleans the air and recirculates the now cool air back into the room. The filters are dishwasher cleanable and easy to replace.
