

Minority Teachers More Likely To Work In Inner City

WASHINGTON (AP) - Teachers who enter the profession without a college degree in teaching are more likely to be minorities and to want to work in inner-city schools, according to a study released Monday.

A third of the teachers who took an alternate route to the classroom say they'd be willing to work in large inner cities, compared to 12 percent of all current public school teachers and 12 percent of new hires from traditional programs, according to the study by the National Center for Education Information.

The independent, non-partisan research group looked at alternative certification plans in two states as part of a larger teacher study. It found that 43 percent of the non-traditional teachers in Texas and 20 percent of those in New Jersey were minorities.

The overall teaching force is becoming older, whiter and more female, the study found. The average age of all public school teachers is 42 years; of new teachers hired since 1985, the average age is 35 years. Ninety-two percent of all public school teachers are white and 71 percent are women.

The study of 3,201 elementary and secondary school teachers currently on the job also concluded that a predicted teaching shortage probably will not occur because many teachers who leave the profession tend to return.

Of the teachers in the study, 38 percent have had at least one break from teaching; 46 percent of those hired since 1985 have had one break and 18 percent of these have had two or more breaks.

"Teaching appears to be a revolving door," the study said.

Center director Emily Feistritzer said childbearing was listed most often as the reason for taking a break from teaching. She said more attention should be paid to the "returning teacher phenomenon."

"All this business of teachers being miserable and leaving is not being borne out in data anywhere," she said. There are 2.3 million public school teachers and another 300,000 private school teachers in the United States. Some education-related groups are predicting a shortage due to teacher attrition, increasing student enrollments and fewer college graduates seeking teaching jobs.

Thanks to Teachers, an organization sponsored by the National Education Association and private business groups, reports that many school districts already are reporting shortages. The group says far too few college students are enrolled in teacher-training programs to fill the expected 1.3 million teaching job openings expected by 1994.

Other studies have estimated that about 200,000 new teachers would be needed a year.

However, Feistritzer said about 650,000 teachers have been hired in the last five years, averaging out to 130,000 a year. About 71,000 of those hired each year are new teachers.
