Soldiers Can Get Recorded Christmas Message In Philip Morris Cards

RALEIGH (AP) - Troops stationed in the Middle East will get Christmas cards this year containing recorded messages from friends and family at home, paid for by the Philip Morris Inc. cigarette brand's marketing division.

Though the card has only a small Marlboro trademark on the back, its cover and winter cowboy motif inside feature scenes similar to those used to advertise the cigarette.

The American Cancer Society wants Philip Morris to rein in the project.

"This sounds like a move to recruit smokers," Joann Schellenbach, spokesman for the society in New York, when the card was described to her. "The cowboy has almost become a symbol for Marlboro." Some Marlboro ads with rugged cowboys, she said, do not even mention the product's name because of the strong symbolic tie.

Yet a Marlboro spokesman said she saw no resemblance between the cards and Marlboro ads. The card is not intended to promote sales in any way, but is merely a public service, said Sheila Banks in New York, media affairs director for Philip Morris USA.

Technicians will visit 10 military bases this week, including Fort Bragg and Camp Lejeune in North Carolina, where anyone may record a message that will be inserted upon a tiny computer chip inside a Marlboro Christmas card. The recording plays when the card is pressed.

Ms. Schellenbach said improving the tobacco industry's image seemed to be the primary motive for the cards.

"If they were really that concerned about this country, they would be more concerned about the 400,000 people who die annually in the United States because of cigarette smoking," she said.

Mrs. Banks said the card did not carry the Surgeon General's warning messages, as required by law on cigarette advertising, because the card was not an ad.

About 80,000 servicemen are expected to get the cards, which can hold 10-second messages. Postage will be paid by Philip Morris.

Recordings at Fort Bragg and Camp Lejeune will be done at the post exchanges Friday through Nov. 11.
