FOCUS ON SENIORS

Tools for Seniors

By Stacy Deibler

Many seniors suffer from arthritis, poor eyesight, difficulty walking, standing, decreased flexibility and other problems that make it hard to do even simple chores. The most common tools become difficult to manipulate. Don't despair.

"If you're looking for a better way to do anything from slicing potatoes to planting your garden, help is available," notes Mature Outlook magazine. "Several companies are distributing tools, utensils and other gadgets specifically designed for efficient use."

"We've selected products that people can use to make everyday tasks a little simpler," says Shareen Punian, president of Greatest of Ease Co. "You can always tell when a product has been properly designed because it will be comfortable to hold and easy to use, and it lets you manage tasks with only a little effort." Popular products include an L-shaped Swedish bread knife, with a handle at a 90-degree angle to the blade. To cut, you use the same grip as in pulling a lever. The firm also produces gadgets to open jars, reach for things on high shelves, shuffle cards.

Maddak Inc., maker of home health-care and rehabilitation products, just introduced Dyna-Form-II, a putty-like material that can be custom molded to create cushioned grips on tools, spoons, cups, pens, keys, door knobs, canes, walkers, drawer pulls, latches and other items used by seniors and the handicapped. YOU & YOUR CHILD Acquired or Natural Talent?

By Eileen Adams

Q: I was told, or I read somewhere (I forget), that a child who shows no special talents or skills during infancy and early "toddlerhood" will have no special talents. I wonder if this is true, since at a very early age my son exhibited a natural penchant for music, playing for hours on our piano with no training. Today, with lessons, he has become an accomplished pianist.

Would he have become so if not for his early years tinkering with our Steinway? — Rose Y., Scarsdale, N.Y.

A: Maybe yes, maybe no.

From what you said, it sounds like you caught a glimpse of your youngster fiddling with the keys on the family piano and thought perhaps he had an interest in it. As such, you got him some fine tutelage and he is now progressing nicely in his study of music.

If he had not fiddled with those keys, do you think you would have enrolled him in piano lessons? While I do not know the answer for you, many parents might say no.

On the other hand, let's say the child at age 6 or 7 starts banging keys on the piano in his school. And let's further say that your teacher calls you out and tells you your son is quite the astute student. Would you have enrolled in piano lessons at that point? Yes, maybe no.

You see, oftentimes special talents don't come out until a child has exposure to the activity. A child who lives in Florida might get on hockey skates until he goes on a school field trip to the hockey rink, at which time he tears up the ice! Accordingly, natural skill or ability won't shine until given the opportunity.

Of course, you must remember all children are very special and unique, all growing and developing at their own pace. The best thing parent to do in an effort to use natural talents is to be patient, their children while exposing them to the many opportunities and activities which are available to them.

KEEPING FIT

Everybody pigs out once in a while.

But some people have totally lost control of their eating habits. They either starve themselves, an eating disorder called anorexia, or go through secretive cycles of bingeing on food, then purging, called bulimia.

Bulimics usually use self-induced vomiting, laxatives, diuretics or fasting as the purge part of the cycle.

But some use excessive exercise. "Exercise bulimics choose exercise as their form of purging to control body weight and shape," according to a recent issue of Drug Topics magazine.

"Exercise for these people undoes the physical and emotional effect of an eating binge. Through exercise the bulimic counteracts calories and guilt, and so regains control of the body."

Eating disorders aren't completely understood. But here are some facts on bulimics and exercise bulimics. If you identify with the signs, or know someone who might have a problem, seek medical treatment at a major hospital with a specific program for eating disorders.

* Nearly 5 percent of college women are bulimics and more than 90 percent of bulimics are female.

* People with eating disorders are often perfectionists, competitive and highly educated.

* They often have unresolved and avoid dealing with their own anxiety.

* They have a distorted body image.

* Exercise bulimics schedule life around exercise.

* They exercise even when they are sick or injured.

* They adjust their workout to compensate for how much they binge and will determine how they eat by how much time they to exercise.

* Risk factors for bulimia include excessive dieting, a personal or family history of depression, alcohol or drug abuse, relationship difficulties, low self-esteem, a history of being overweight.
