FROM THE METROPOLITAN. THE EDUCATION OF LOVE.

BY S. WILD. Young Love was once, (long ere the seige of Troy A very beautiful but simple boy; His blue eyes sparkled, and his heart was light, His flowing ringlets were as sun-beams bright-But then the child could neither read nor write. 'Tis true, whilst roaming on his bucyant wing, He sought and found a joy in every thing; True, that his bosom would enraptur'd thrill, When by the fountain or the tinkling rill, He met the wood-nymphs, or the Grecian maids, Or rambled with them through the forest shades; But then, alas! the little urchin knew Not even how to pen a billet-doux; A simple flower, cull'd for the maiden's breast, One half of that which he would say exprest; His eyes most eloquently told the rest. Minerva mark'd all this-and undertook, (Ah! fatal task,) to teach the boy his book. She first his mother sought; "Madam," said she, Pity it is so sweet a boy should be So sad a dunce!" Venus confess'd it was, indeed, too bad, And begg'd Minerva would instruct the lad At once.

Then Love was torn from his wild haunts away, And nymph and maiden mourn'd him many a day, With all the pathos of the rustic lay, Sung to the sighing breeze and mosning brooks Meantime the boy wept o'er the hated book, Envying the bird that past, on wing so free, To the green woodlands, where he longed to be, Instead of moping there o'er A, B, C. In vain he weeps, in vain remission asks, For one short moonlight ramble from his tasks; The stern Minerva, with an angry look, ... Boxes his ears and bids him mind his book. At length, (so mystic hieroglyphs relate,) Young Love became submissive to his fate: Grew fond of learning-but, alas! he grew Proud, insincere, and avaricious tool Some wood-nymphs found him studying neath a

But not one smile could all their smiles provoke, He ask'd them, if they took him for a fool? Toss'd his proud head, and hurried back to school. Beauty, however, soon reclaim'd the boy, Back to his former woodland haunts of joy; But he had learnt, alas! to cheat her ear COACH MAKERS. But ob, still worse, was that sad m Minerva taught young Love to use his pen. Farewell the token-flower—the speaking eye— The ready blush that would reveal the lie; His feelings, passions, now may all be told On smooth white paper, with an edge of gold; The cheated maidens, were they on the spot, Might see him blush,—the paper tells it not; Impassion'd words of feelings never felt
He uses now, the wood-nymphs' hearts to melt,
They read the soft epistle and believe,
Whilst the sly urchin titters in his sleeve. Lais, dear Lais, how shall I express, My bleeding bosom's utter wretchedness!
I've had a hurt, it is, indeed, but slight— But then, 'twill keep me from the grove to sight Lais, dear Lais, say, can words reveal The pangs which those who love in absence feel

It is with feelings of no ordinay regret we announce to our readers the death of our highly ven-BLOUNT, Esquire, who expired without a struggle or a groan, at a little before 2 o'clock this morning in the 81st year of his age. All who were honored with an acquaintance of the deceased, can bear ready testimony to his inesti-mable worth and most respected character. A kinder or more affectionate parent never lived, a more sincere friend, or a more disinterested benefactor. He has left a numerous and afflicted family to mourn their bereavement, and a void in society which his surviving friends and the community at large will feel is not readily to be supplied.
