BREAK WITH TURKEY WOULD IMPERIL AMERICAN MISSIONS IN THAT COUNTRY

BY THE RELIGIOUS RAMBLER

(Copyright, 1917, by William T. Ellis).

While the press has been so engrossed with the Teutonic aspect of America's crisis that it has almost wholly ignored Turkey, a host of informed men and women are looking toward developments in the Near East as more significant for the United States than anything that may happen in connection with Germany.

A break with Turkey imperils American lives, American property, and American stewardship of souls held in trust for civilization. It is the church people who are best informed upon this extraordinary situation, and who are most closely watching developments. This is not merely because most of the American Turkey are missionaries, and most of the American property belongs to churches in this country; but it is primarily because, of all the general American public, these friends of missions alone have been long-time students of conditions in the Near East.

The tremendous importance of influencing Turkey not to follow her German overlord in breaking off relations with the United States may be made clear in a few paragraphs. Within the Ottoman empire, since the outbreak of the war has driven out British and French and Russian consuls and nationalities, America alone has represented civilization. The Teutonic Powers have joined in with the Turks in a reign of terrorization. Their part in the Armenian deportations, for instance, has certainly not been that of a restraining influence. It is said, on good authority, that the British prisoners have suffered worst in places where Germans were most in evidence.

Safeguarding Civilization in Turkey. Once he gets out of hand, the Turk very easily reverts to his natural savagery. Only the presence of the great powers has maintained the semblance of modern civilized government in the Ottoman Empire. The outbreak of the war placed all this vast responsibility upon American shoulders.

American consuls and missionaries had to take over the work and interests of the British and French and Italian and Russian consulates and missions. Some day history will give full credit to the Americans in Turkey, from the Ambassador down to the remotest consular and missionary, for the unprecedented labors they have performed in looking after all the varied and delicate and difficult affairs of these other nations, besides being the almoners of relief amid unprecedented conditions of distress.

One American Woman's Task. A single illustration will make plainer than many explanations the conditions that exist in this land so alien to American understanding. About 500 civilians, British, French, Russian, etc., are interned in Turkey, near the city of Konla, the old Icolium, where the apostle Paul had such distressful times. No provision is made for the shelter or maintenance of these men by the Turkish Government. Unless aid had come from the outside, they would have starved.

Funds for food are supplied through prisoners' governments, by way of the American Embassy at Constantinople. But the only possible way the English has of reaching and serving the men is through a missionary resident in Konla. Thus it comes about that this large company, of various nationalities, are literally dependent upon one American woman for their daily bread.

Some day, through grateful survivors, we shall also hear of the ministrations of American missionaries to suffering British soldiers, captured by the Turks, who made the journey safe over almost the entire greatest length of the Turkish Empire, from Bagdad to Konla. Even the giving of Christian burial to the soldiers who died from typhus was a service to justify the presence of the Americans.

Americans Almoners to Armenians. All the relief that has thus far been given to the survivors of the Armenian deportations—at $2,500,000 has been sent thus far from America—has been distributed by American missionaries and American consuls. There is a reasonable prospect that, if present conditions continue, a considerable remnant of the Armenian race will be saved.

But if America is obliged to withdraw all her representatives from Turkey, there will be nobody left to distribute relief. The Armenians will die by additional tens of thousands. Germany forbade her nationals to have any part in Armenian relief work; the Turks themselves could not be trusted to apply the funds for the purpose intended, and there is nobody else in the land to do the work.

Late advices, as yet unprinted, tell of increasing starvation among the Greeks and Syrians and Jews as among the Armenians. The only possible hope of success for these stragglers lies in the Americans in Turkey.

America's Big Stake in Turkey. Many a man of dollars would mention hundreds of devoted lives invited to attend all of these services.
