and the difference in the conditions of men who, in blood, culture and abilities are the same, is a thing which has never been understood. While some may eat the bread of idleness all the days of their lives, others, men, too, their peers, in all things, must delve and toil continually, only to find at the end of each year that their condition is worse than when the year began. Right here in our midst we see life in almost all its phases. There is the wealthy man, who, have retired into almost idleness, upon a competency. Further down, is the man who is striving for a comfortable livelihood, while further still is he who fights daily and nightly to keep the wolf from the door of his wife and children, or relatives who are dependent upon his exertions.
