As further information (reliable or unreliable) upon the point at issue, we quote the following from the Washington Republican of Thursday:

Gen. Garfield's visit to him [the President] was occasioned by a proper anxiety, in view of his position as the acknowledged Republican leader in the House, to understand exactly what his fellow-partisans in that body might expect from the administration in the pending emergency, wherein it is acknowledged the most vital interests of that party are at stake. It is sufficient, to add that he came 'away from the President convinced that a reasonable prospect exists of harmonious concert of action between him and the Republicans in Congress in opposition to the general line of repeal policy proposed by the Bourbons.

Sparks, of Illinois, renewed it. The chairman sustained the point on the ground that the amendment was not in the direction of economy, and changed the existing order.

'An amendment to amend the act granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812 was ruled out of order.

McCook, of New York, moved to strike out the section prohibiting promotions or appointments in the army beyond the rank of captain except in the engineers. In the discussion which followed some sharp remarks were interchanged between Sparks, of Illinois, and Conger, of Michigan, as to the services rendered by them respectively during the late war, Sparks stating that like the gentleman from Michigan he had been a little too cowardly to fight on either side. Conger replied that he
