CHAPTER XV. The Government of Rome as Illustrating the Concurrent Principle.

Calhour's Disquisition on Government, which is the science of government and which is of the essence of the great subject, closes with an analysis of the origin and character of the governments of Rome and Great Britain.
These have been selected to exemplify the fundamental principles established in the disquisition from the fact of their in the disquisition from the fact of their being deemed the two most remarkable and excellent of their respective forms of constitutional government. The object is to show how the principles laid down in the disquisition were applied in the more simple forms of such government—preliminary and preparatory to an exposition of the grander mode in which the said principles have been applied in the government of the United States of America: which exposition is contained in Calhoun's masterly discourse on the government and constitucourse on the government and constitu-tion of the United States—in some re-spects the new political testament of the great statesman when taken in connection with his disquisition, and when is considered the blaze of light which he throws upon the work of the fathers of the country.

Preliminary now to the analysis of the government of Rome, it may be repeated that Calhoun holds this that not only was the concurrent principle and his other principles of government applied in the case of Rome and Great Britain, but that they were applied on a still grander scale in the more complex machinery of the Government of these States. In the three cases the principles are the same, although they were applied differently, owing to the different situation and circumstances of the communities. In Rome and Great Britain the principles were applied in communities in which hereditary rank had long prevailed. Their respective constitutions originated in concessions to the people. In the case of this republic the application of the principles was more difficult, because all political rank and distinction between citizens were excluded. With us government had its origin in the will of the people. But in all, the object was the same, viz; to enthrone the concurrent principle, that is, to take the sense of each class or portion of the community through its appropriate organ and consider the con-current sense of all as the sense of the whole community.

The Roman people consisted of two distinct orders, the Patricians and the Plebeians. The line of demarcation was strongly drawn; so strongly drawn that for a long time the right of intermarriage was prohibited. After the oversion of the Tarquins, the government to Binghamton, N. Y. fell into the hands of the Patricians, who, with their clients and dependents, formed a powerful body. At first they treated the Plebeians with kindness, so long as there was danger of the return of the Tarquins, Afterwards the Plebeians were treated with great cruelty. The Plebeians won the victories of the day, and the Patricians seized all the day, and the Patricians seized all the fruits. The result was deep hatred between the two orders. Faction, violence and corruption followed. An incident occurred which brought the two parties into direct conflict. This is the sacred mount. The Patricians divided in opinion as to the course which should be pursued. An appeal to arms was imminent, but the spirit of compromise prevailed and the Plebeians were conceed the right to elect two tribunes as the protectors of their carbon. These tribunes are the protectors of their carbon. These tribunes are the protectors of their carbon. the protectors of their order. The number was afterwards increased to ten, the Plebeians secured full power, the tribunate was established, opening all the honors of the govern-

r the concurrent and joint voice of separate organs. The one possessed the positive, and the other the negative powers of the government. Thus was the Roman government converted from one absolute into one constitutional in character; from one of the Patricians only to that of the whole people; from an aristocracy to a republic. Thus was laid the solid foundation of Roman liberty and greatness. Calhoun holds that the concurrent principle thus enthroned made Rome all she was in her palmiest days. Conflicts between the orders were moderated; interests were harmonized, unselfish patriotism grew to be the pre-vailing sentiment; the Roman name was elevated above other names; and the authority of Rome was extended over the greater part of the then known world. All of this, Calhoun holds, was due to the compromise made at the critical period in Roman history. Had the Patricians and Plebeians resorted to arms, there is every reason to believe that Rome would have been as insignificant as the petty States which sur-rounded her. Had the Patricians or the Plebeians prevailed, Rome would have been probably conquered by some of the neighboring States. But having put the concurrent principle in force, she won unbounded sway and imper-ishable renown. It is true that the tribunate ultimately became one of the instruments by which Roman liberty was overthrown, but that overthrow was because of outside dangers to which Rome became subject in the course of time. The concurrent principle accomplished the object for which it was formed; it preserved the internal of the government but it could not prevent Rome from falling beneath the exterior shocks which she afterwards received. It is true that under influences from without Rome divided into factions and fell into military despotism, but this argues naught to the prejudice of the tribunate, which, after fully accomplishing its purpose, was seized and made to over-throw the liberty it had originally established. Another peculiarity with regard to the government of Rome was the power which the senate had of ap-pointing a dictator, when the republic was in imminent danger. This, together with other powers invested in the senate, gave the Patricians great power. At the same time the Plebeians, through I their organs, also possessed great power. Thus the positive and the negative powers being strong, the government became one of iron—strong and good for
