Of the Democrats 530 prefer Morrison, 147 Davis, 279 Tilden, 92 Seymour, 79 Hancock, 46 Palmer, and 29 Bayard. Of the Republicans, 580 want Blaine, and 394 Grant. Sherman's friends numbered 9.

According to the following extract from a manuscript document in the library of Aix-la-Chapelle, entitled "Historical Chronicle of Aix-la-Chapelle, Second Book, year 1748," edited by the writer to the Mayoralty, "Johann Janssen," it would appear that the invention of steel pens is of older date than is commonly supposed. The paper referred to says: "Just at the meeting of the Congress I may without boasting claim the honor of having invented new pens. It is perhaps not an accident that God should have inspired me at the present time with the idea of making steel pens, for all the envoys here assembled have bought the first that have been made, therewith, as may be hoped, to sign a treaty of peace, which, with God's blessing, shall be as permanent as the hard steel with which it is written. Of these pens, as I have invented them, no man hath before seen or heard; if kept clean and free from rust or ink, they will continue fit for use for many years. Indeed, a man may write twenty sheets of paper with one, and the last line would be written as well as the first. They are now sent into every corner of the world as a rare thing—to Spain, France and England. The Invention of Steel Pens. thing—to Spain, France and England.

Harriet W. Preston, in April Atlantic. "Women like her," said Sainte-Beuve, speaking of Mms. Roland, "will always always be exceptional." I have sometimes thought the whole truth about the haskneyed matter of the higher education, the whole philosophy of what is utilized the woman question, is summed up in these words:

More of oversional intellegation that the end of the woman question, is summed up in these words:

More of oversional intellegation is summed up in these words: Men of original intellectual force, creators, organizers, directors, whether of human thought or human affairs, are noticemmon; but would of this type are a great deal less common than men. are a great deal less common than men. It is worth while to make arrangements on a large scale for the careful and costly training of boys, which it would be foolish and extravagant to make for girls; because in the one case there is a probability that the proportion to the whole of these who are worthy of such training, though small, will be sufficient to repay the outlay, and in the other there is no such probaand in the other there is no such probability. The woman of genius, when she combs, must make her own place, and Sainte-Beuve tells us, and experience shows us that she will. And when in the productions of such a woman, we may partially console ourselves by reflecting that she, probably, of all gifted creatures, can best dispense with formal discipline. Heaven itself cannot linder that her genius should be feminine—that is to say, of the kind which appropriates unconsciously, which divines mysteriously, which combines and arranges with an instinctive but invincible sense of harmony and proportion. ble sense of harmony and proportion. And it would sometimes seem as if the free flowering of such a genius were detailly checked, and its finest results distorted by a too assiduous external enrichment.
