This idea of States instruct-ing district delegates to vote as a unit is, he says, the old Confederate plan. and is based on the theory that the State is supreme. District delegates are in immediate relation to the people, and a State convention has no right to abridge that representative position. District delegates are in the immediate line of the people, just as a citizen is in immediate connection with the nation, and holds that connection above any State authority or license. A citizen in giving his allegiance to the government is untrammelled by State interference, and so a district delegate. as representative direct from the people, should be allowed to vote as his

For Englishmen especially, the story of the American civil war must always possess the most powerful attractions. On both sides the principles involved were those which most deeply affected our own national feeling; the language, the race, the ideas of the combatants were our own. The army of northern Virginia in particular, from the nature of the defence it had to maintain, and tinue to enlist the strongest English sympathies. It fought with English tenacity, English recklessness of consequences, English indifference to odds, which was from the first very doubtful and soon became an evidently losing battle. Once only was it fought beater battle. Once only was it fairly beaten in open field: over and over again, both on the offensive and on the defensive, it proved itself more than a match for apparently overwhelming odds. Its com-position resembled very closely that of our own volunteer regiments. Its chiefs were men whose personal character and public conduct display all the virtues on which Englishmen most pride themseves as the people of Virginia are perhaps the most thoroughly English of all the many offsets which the mother race has planted in every part of the world
