Dropping a Seed.

THE LAND WAS STILL; THE SKIES WERE GRAY WITH WEED.
Into the soft brown earth the seed he cast;

THE GOLDEN TIME WHEN CLOUDS AND TEARS ARE PAID
There came a whisper through the autumn haze,

Hour after hour she marks the fiftieth gleaming
Of sunlight stealing through the cloudy rift;

At early morning, chilled and sad, she hearkens
To stormy winds that through the poplars blow;

Half-cheered, half-doubting yet, she strays and
Listens To fancies singing to the shy young flowers;

Oh, happy world! she cries, the sun is shining!
I could not trust his word without repining.

He answered, "Spoke I not of many days?"
The snow drop blooms; the purple violet glances

Half-cheered, half-doubting yet, she strays and
Listens To fancies singing to the shy young flowers;

Oh, happy world! she cries, the sun is shining!
I could not trust his word without repining.

He answered, "Spoke I not of many days?"
The snow drop blooms; the purple violet glances

Half-cheered, half-doubting yet, she strays and
Listens To fancies singing to the shy young flowers;

THE LADIES' DEPOSIT BANK GOES—A RICKLES ADVENTURE.

BOSTON, Oct. 15.—That miracle of shrewd woman's inhumanity to gullible

It was a sort of goose which for a time laid golden eggs, but which has demonstrated the inutility of keeping up the production.

This was the concern which paid eight per cent interest a month, part of it in advance. It is a story which reads

like a tale of the delusions of two centuries ago,

when the Mississippi scheme and the South Sea mania swept away
the earnings of the simple. Mrs. Howe, the chief president of the temple on whose altar the unwise ladies offered up their savings, had a record which fitted her much better for the insane asylum or the penitentiary than for the head of a banking establishment. Yet when she opened the doors of her bank to receive money from her own sex and take care of it in advance, it is a story which reads

like a tale of the delusions of two centuries ago,
when the Mississippi scheme and the South Sea mania swept away the earnings of the simple. Mrs. Howe, the chief president of the temple on whose altar the unwise ladies offered up
