announced to the company that news had just reached him of the death near noon on the day of Thomas Jefferson. After a few remarks on the life character and public services of Mr. Jefferson, Mr. Johnston requested all present to all their glasses, as he desired to offer a sentiment. This was done. He then desired that the company would rise and recite the following: While we thus stand deeply impressed with the solemnity of the event which has been thus unexpectedly announced, Mr. Johnston offered the following sentiment: 'The memory of Thomas Jefferson, author of the Declaration of Independence, through the mortal man may never witness another celebration of the day which his pen has so much illustrated, his immortal spirit will be present and inspire the last generation with his lofty memory. The sentiment was purely impromptu. He did not take time to commit it to paper. He gave it to us as it came, passing up like living water from the fountain of his great heart and it found a response in the heart of every one who was present. As for myself, every word that he uttered became as it were, engrossed on the lips of all. I have never since felt that I am able to report Mr. Jefferson's last not only with substantial but with literal accuracy.'
