doctor returned on shore, and a few minutes afterwards a terrible exploother. These boats being nearest the ruined vessel were first to render assistance. All the boats were soon on the scene of the disaster, and the clearing away of the smoke enabled them amid the fragments of wood to seek those whom it was possible to save. A boat of the San Jose discovered two objects in the water, one of them striking out with the desperation of a person in last extremities. Hastening to the spot one of the sufferers was saved from certain death. The body was completely naked, and from four or five wounds blood was flowing shandantly. Wranblood was flowing abundantly. Wrapping the body in a blanket the boat pulled for the shore at once. The wounded man was borne by five men to a house near the wharf. An examination by the doctor who dressed his wounds and wrapped him comfortably in blankets, and put him in bed, proved the suffer to be Commander Evans.

Other boats arrived at about the same time with seven more individuals who belonged to the crew. All had received wounds. One of them, the quarter-master, had a terrible wound in the head, and received several contusions.

In a couple of hours all of them were able to walk about town except the captain and quartermaster, whose wounds confined them to their beds. On board the missionary schooner of the bishop of the Malvina Islands four of the rescued sailors were taken, who, during the afternoon, were able to land and join their comrades. The boats remained all day cruising about in the neighborhood of the explosion, but not finding anything living to save, occupied themselves in gathering together a great number of fragments of human bodies, which were floating about. Only three bodies were found entire, and those were fearfully injured. The pieces were gathered together, put in boxes, and buried as soon as they were brought on shore. The three bodies were buried in the cemetery at 5 o'clock on the same afternoon.
