The Social Market in Washington.

Philadelphia Press.

Debutantes are reasonably easy on call, though there has been in certain circles an effort to ran a corner. The supply of male escorts is quite equal to the demand for middlings, but some disappointment is felt on account of the non-arrival of a cargo of assorted goods consigned to a commission firm in Washington and expected to arrive via New York in bond. Fears are expressed that the tariff commission may be inclined to impose a heavy tariff in retaliation for the prohibition of American cottonseed oil by Italy and American pork by Germany. The French article is no longer quoted, the imports having almost entirely ceased. Waiting foreign arrivals and partly on account of the uncertainty attaching to the appropriation bills, marriageable congressmen are in slight request, though some dealers are unwilling to part with present holdings at a sacrifice. These dealers are confident that the appropriations will be magnificent, and that sundry subsidy enterprises, now regarded as impossible, will command the patriotic endorsement of Congress. Old maid are a glut, there being scarcely any demand for them except for the gilt-edge variety, and these only from second-class clerks. Legislation ladies are stiff and not largely desired. Few dealers are reported except by committee clerks, the business being considerably cut up of late years, and a prime article in the market, namely, horses, will be with about the same effort. Down east school-maids, once favorite stock, are generally refused now for the Southern belle of fast recuperating fortunes. Widows prime to choice, seller $30@40, have advanced a few points over previous quotations in consequence of a visit from a territorial delegation. The general tone, though not buoyant, cannot be said to be greatly depressed, as the bears would have it believed. Balls, in fair quantities, are on the carpet, and informal gatherings, as compared with the supply of other seasons, almost hold their own. There will be greater activity as the season advances.
